CHAPTER I.

Letter from Duroc — The Princess of Wirtemberg Expected at Raincy — Consternation — Preparations for the Reception of Her Royal Highness — Her Arrival — Her Portrait — Dismissal of Her German Attendants — The Royal Breakfast — M. de Winzingerode — Stag Hunt in the Park — The Princess's Dress — The Dinner at Raincy — Her Royal Highness's Request — Arrival of Prince Jerome — Recollections of Baltimore — Interview of Jerome Bonaparte with the Princess Catherine — Departure for Paris, and Arrival at the Tuileries — Junot's Distress — The Faubourg Saint Germain — Invitation to a Ball at the Hôtel de Luynes — My Dress — Madame de Chevreuse — Madame de Balby.

IT WAS the 20th of August; Junot had made all his preparations for his journey, and was gone to dine with M. Lalligant, one of his friends, to whose child he and Madame de Caraman were to stand sponsors. The house was encumbered with chests and portmanteaus, the courtyard with baggage wagons and carriages; everything announced the approaching departure of the master of the mansion: in fact, in two days Junot was about to set out for Bordeaux, the place of his immediate destination.

I had superintended all that was to make the journey agreeable, and I was fatigued; but at nine o'clock, just as I was going to bed, my valet de chambre informed me certain hotel, where he had learned the purport of Duroc's letter, which was to the following effect:

"The Princess Royal of Wirtemberg, my dear Junot, will arrive at Raincy with her suite to-morrow morning at nine o'clock, and will rest there till seven in the evening. His Majesty has made this arrangement. Will you have the goodness to give orders that everything should be in readiness to receive her? I will send whatever you think requisite for her proper accommodation, and for the kitchen service.

"I renew my assurances of attachment to you.

"DUROC.

"20th — at six in the evening."

"Well!" said I to Junot, after reading it, "a pretty task they are setting us! it is much like one of the orders given to the Princess Graciosa by her tyrannical step-mother; but the misfortune is, we have no Prince Percinet with his wand." Junot walked about with an anxious look. I saw that I had done wrong in complaining, which would but increase his ill-humor, and, going up to him with a smile, I said:

"But standing there like the god Terminus will not forward this business that I am complaining of, and which, after all, is not worth talking about. It appears that her Royal Highness is to spend the whole day with us at Raincy; it will be your affair to dispose matters so that she shall not be weary of us; which is just possible, because neither the dogs nor the stags are packed up, so that you will be able to show her a hunt; and if it should not be quite so agreeable to you as your chase by the light of flambeaux, the Princess will understand that, with the best intentions in the world, it is only possible to give what one has. Come, answer Duroc; or do you wish me to do it." And I went to my desk. Junot looked at me, listened, and seemed to wake up by degrees; his fine countenance, to which gloom was not at all becoming, cleared up, and at last became even cheerful. "Yes, an-

to be perfectly prepared for the reception of the Princess at the hour appointed."

I then sent for Rechaud. This Rechaud was a clever, and, in our present dilemma, a most important, personage; he was, moreover, a thoroughly honest man, a qualification not often to be found combined with skill in his profession. He and his brother had been brought up in the kitchen of the Prince of Condé, and afterward became so expert in cookery that they attained great celebrity in the gastronomic world. Rechaud had previously given me a specimen of his ability in the direction in which it was now wanted, by preparing in a few hours for the reception of the Marquis de la Romana at Raincy in great form. I explained the state of the case, and he instantly understood all that was to be done. "Madame may set out for Raincy," he said with a sang-froid worthy of Vatel; "everything shall be ready at the time mentioned."

I knew Rechaud, and, getting into my carriage, set out for Raincy without any anxiety, at ten o'clock at night, and in delightful weather. On reaching the mansion I found carts already arrived with provisions for the morrow. All night the road to Raincy was traveled over by goers and comers transporting thither whatever was needful, not simply for food, but for luxury. The next morning, before I was up, Rechaud tapped at the door of the bathroom, where I had slept to leave my apartment for the use of the Princess of Wirtemberg, in case she should wish to retire to it upon her arrival; he came to tell me that everything was quite ready.

Neither had I been idle in the department which fell under my superintendence; all the apartments were in perfect order for the reception of the Princess and suite, even to the superb bathroom, which was prepared in case the Princess should choose to leave the dust of her jourgundy and her sister the fair Gabrielle of Savoy might have made; and when he found that the march of the Princess had been so stupidly calculated that she would arrive within sight of the Barriers at ten o'clock in the morning, he determined that she should not pass them till eight in the evening, and that she should remain in the interim at some private villa which might be hired for the occasion.

The Emperor was going to dismiss Duroc after having given him these orders, when he cried out suddenly: "Oh! parbleu! — Junot — Junot has Raincy — the Princess must spend the day at Raincy. It is a charming place, and I hope she will think it a great deal more beautiful than the huge demi-Gothic castles of Suabia and Bavaria. Besides, Madame Junot knows how to speak to crowned heads. Then write to Junot that the Princess Catherine of Wirtemberg will pass to-morrow with him and his wife."

The Princess arrived at Raincy exactly at nine o'clock, as had been announced. She possessed the German preciseness, even in its minutest details. I was impatient to become acquainted with her. Jerome's fate could not be indifferent to me, for I had loved him from childhood, and though he only had treated me with coldness at the death of my mother, I still continued very much attached to him. He had sworn to me, when we met at breakfast in Estremadura, that he should never forget the mother of his son, her who had given him a paradise in a strange country. I involuntarily thought of that young victim, who was said to be so beautiful, and who was so affectionate! who had had a child! but was that child to become an orphan?

It was therefore with a strong prepossession against her that I approached the Princess of Wirtemberg with my welcome. She received me with perfect grace, and assured indeed her whole figure, been something less she was not pretty in the general acceptation of though all her features were good, for she seldom and the expression of her countenance wanted it was, if not disagreeable, at least exceedingly and was dignified and serious, rather than pleasant; her head was too much sunk between shoulders, though she held it as high as possible nothing of her stature, which was low. At the I first saw her this characteristic haughtiness was than usually conspicuous.

At first this expression struck me as very disagreeable notwithstanding her extreme politeness to myself a few minutes I understood her feelings, and, blaming them, felt myself much interested in her. It was really a very painful one, and it was not a woman, to be insensible to it. Two days previous the Princess had been separated from all her German relations. The Emperor, though he did not like Louis chose him for a model in matters of etiquette; and had isolated the foreign princesses who came into whether from the North, as in the case of the wife of his brother, or from the South, as the Duchess of Berry. So the Princess of Wirtemberg was separated from the German Household, notwithstanding a reluctance natural to one in her situation. This situation was similar to that of all princesses quitting their own country to share a foreign throne; she was obliged at the same time to surmount the national prejudice so strong among the Germans against unequal alliances (a prejudice the Emperor, surrounded by the halo of his glory, the charming spell which commands admiration, might have excepted from the ban, it was not so with his son) and the bitter consideration that she was about to be united to a man who had already contracted a ceived on her entrance into the French territory by the Court of Honor which the Emperor had sent to meet her, and which was wholly taken from that of the Empress, and Marshal Bessières had espoused the Princess as proxy for the Prince.

On the arrival of the Princess at Raincy she was offered a bath in the elegant bathroom, but refused it, and seemed desirous to have an early breakfast. As I did not know what she might like, I had prepared two breakfast services, that she might take hers in her own apartment if she preferred it; but she declined, and even expressed a wish that all my inmates should breakfast with her, desiring me to invite them in her name.

She seemed uneasy, as far as the impassibility of her countenance allowed me to judge, at the delay of her father's Minister, M. de Winzingerode, who did not arrive until ten o'clock: he was a young man, tall, fair, without the smallest degree of expression in his eye, smile, or attitude; a perfect god Terminus: his wife, who was also expected, did not come, for some reason which I do not now recollect. The countenance of the Princess, upon seeing the Ambassador, immediately changed, which further convinced me that my former observation of the constraint she had imposed upon herself was correct: it was clear she was in a state of great suffering; the unexpected removal of her German suite had depressed her, even to the injury of her health, which was manifestly affected.

Breakfast was over by half-past eleven o'clock; I asked the Princess whether she would like to witness a stag hunt in the park, and whether she would ride on horseback or in an open carriage. She chose the carriage, and having ordered two of that sort of basket sociables which are used by the ladies who follow the chase at leaving, indeed, not more than time enough for the party to dress for dinner.

When the Princess came into the drawing-room half an hour before dinner time I felt some regret that no one had had the courage to recommend her a different style of dress. She was about to have a first interview with a man on whom was to depend the happiness of her future life, and whose youthful imagination, poetical as is natural to the natives of the South, could adorn an absent object with additional charms, while Madame Jerome Bonaparte, without the aid of imagination, was really a charming woman.

As the Princess Catherine had made up her mind to give her hand to Prince Jerome, it was the more desirable that she should please him, as, notwithstanding his too ready submission to the will of Napoleon, it was certain he regretted his divorced wife, for Miss Patterson really was his wife, and it would have been politic to appear before him with all the advantages dress could bestow, while, on the contrary, hers was in inconceivably bad taste for the year 1807.

The gown was of white moiré, but of a bluish white, which was out of fashion at the time, and trimmed in front with a very badly-worked silver embroidery, in a style which had also been forgotten: then the cut of the dress itself corresponded exactly with its trimming in point of novelty; it was a very tight frock, with a little train exactly resembling the round tail of the beaver, and tight flat sleeves, compressing the arm above the elbow like a bandage after blood-letting. Her shoes were so pointed that they seemed to belong to the era of King John. The hair was dressed in a similarly old-fashioned style, and was particularly unbecoming to a countenance of which not only the features were good, but the ex-diamonds; the size of the medallion having probably been left to the taste of the jeweler, he had made it of dimensions capable of carrying the greatest possible number of jewels, but certainly much too large to be ornamental, as it dangled from the neck of the Princess, and inflicted heavy blows at every movement.

Rank, however, goes for much in all cases, for her Royal Highness, in this tasteless attire, entered the drawing-room of Raincy with the same majestic air which distinguished her at Saint Cloud two months after, when she walked the gallery in a full Court suit, embroidered by Lenormand, and made by Leroy, her hair dressed by Frederic or Charbonnier, and her neck ornamented by a magnificent necklace admirably set by Foncier or Nitot. Then her apparent indifference to such trifles proved what widely different subjects occupied her really superior mind in this, perhaps, the most important moment of her life.

By her own desire, the ladies only were to dine with her, and in consequence I ordered the dinner in the library, a large rotunda in the left wing of the mansion looking upon the park. We were six, including the Princess and her three ladies, for her Royal Highness was good enough to permit my friend Madame Lallemand to join our party, though she had not yet been presented.

A few moments before the dinner was announced I remarked that the Princess was much agitated. I concluded that she had some wish which she felt unwilling to express to the strangers who surrounded her, and who, in a moment when above all others she stood in need of sympathy, would probably answer her only by a respectful smile or with perfect indifference. I therefore approached her, and, without abruptly putting the question, I led her on to speak to me with more confidence than she had yet done to any of the persons in her service. "Would it be possible," said she, "for me to have some minutes' notice leading from the highroad nearly to the grand entrance of the mansion is almost three furlongs in length.

I mentioned the Princess's wish to Junot, who thought with me that she was desirous of preparing her mind for an interview of which she had probably a painful anticipation. He immediately gave orders to M. de Grandsaigne to take his station at the end of the avenue nearest to the house, and the moment the Prince's carriages should appear to bring me word. I informed the Princess that her wishes should be attended to, and we sat down to table, while Junot entertained Marshal Bessières and the rest of her Royal Highness's suite in the dining room.

The dinner was dull. I watched the movements of the Princess, which were more restless than in the morning; her cheeks were highly flushed, and her absent manner betrayed an inward agitation, disguised by the dignity which she had been taught. We remained but a short time at table; when I had twice asked whether her Royal Highness would like to take her coffee and ice in the park or in the great salon, she looked at me with the air of a person who hears without understanding, and said: "Eh? whichever you please."

At half-past six we retired to the salon, and the Princess having asked me whether I had thought of her wishes, I went to inquire if Junot had taken care that his vidette was at his post. But finding that Junot, Bessières, and the rest of the gentlemen, relieved from their attendance by the wish of the Princess, thought only of lengthening out the pleasures of a good dinner, and that the dining room was sending out loud evidences of their joviality, I went myself to the Russian cottage, where poor M. de Grandsaigne was dining all alone, and pointing his opera glass down the avenue.

"Sister Anne, Sister Anne!" I cried out to him from

ently several carriages entered the avenue. I then immediately went to give notice to the Princess, who thanked me with a half smile which was painful to witness. Her face assumed a deep scarlet hue, and her agitation for a moment was alarming; but it subsided, at least outwardly, and she quickly regained her self-command.

She called Madame de Luçay to her, and probably gave her orders that her departure should immediately follow the interview; she then took her station in the salon where it was to take place. This salon, as previously described, is divided into three parts, the music room being at one extremity, the billiard room at the other, and the reception or drawing-room in the middle. In this center division the Princess seated herself beside the chimney, having an armchair near her which was intended for the Prince. We were all in the billiard room, from whence we could see all that passed in the drawing-room, being separated from it only by a range of pillars with statues in the intercolumniations. The Prince was to enter by the music room.

Already the rolling of the carriage wheels in the avenue was heard, when Madame Lallemand, catching hold of my dress, exclaimed: "Do you know it has just crossed my mind that the sight of me at this moment may make an awkward impression upon the Prince? I had better retire." "Why?" "Because the last time he saw me was at Baltimore with Miss Patterson, with whom I was very intimate. Do you not think that seeing me again, on such an occasion as the present, might recall a great deal that has passed?" "Indeed I do!" I exclaimed, thrusting her into the adjoining room, for at this moment a noise in the hall announced the Prince's arrival, and in a few seconds the door was opened and Marshal Bessières introduced him.

Prince Jerome was accompanied by the officers of his

The salon of Raincy seemed to be made expressly for the interview which was now to take place. The Princess was seated near the chimney, though there was no fire. The Prince's attendants remained in the music room during the interview. On the Prince's entrance she rose, advanced two steps toward him, and greeted him with equal grace and dignity. Jerome bowed neither well nor ill, but somewhat mechanically, and he seemed to be there because he had been told, "You must go there." He approached the Princess, who seemed at this moment to have recovered all her presence of mind, and all the calm dignity of the woman and the princess. After the exchange of a few words she offered to the Prince the arm-chair, which had been placed near her, and a conversation was opened upon the subject of her journey. It was short, and closed by Jerome's rising and saying, "My brother is waiting for us; I will not longer deprive him of the pleasure of making acquaintance with the new sister I am about to give him."

The Princess smiled, and accompanied the Prince as far as the entrance of the music room, whence he retired with his attendants. As soon as she had lost sight of him, the color in her cheeks increased so violently that I feared the bursting of a blood vessel. She admitted indisposition; we gave her air and eau de Cologne; in a few minutes she recovered her self-possession. This fainting fit, though laid to the account of heat and fatigue, was certainly occasioned by the violent restraint the Princess had for some hours put upon herself.

I have heard the devotedness of the Queen of Westphalia very highly eulogized, and in fact it was truly noble in her peculiar situation. She was ready to set out when Junot came to inform her that her carriages were drawn up. I stayed at Raincy, for the day had been so

She set out accompanied by Junot and Bessières. I afterward learned that on her arrival at the Tuileries the Emperor went to the top of the great staircase to meet her. On approaching him she made an effort to kneel and kiss his hand, but the Emperor, stooping immediately, constrained her to rise, and conducted her to the throne room, where all the Imperial Family were assembled, and where he presented her to them as a daughter and sister. She was surrounded, caressed, and received with every mark of satisfaction into the family circle.

When I returned to Paris I found Junot in a state of distress which gave me extreme pain. Every effort had been used to erect between the Emperor and his old aide-camp, his old friend, a kind of barrier, of the nature of which Junot himself was not aware, because his frank nature kept him a stranger to all mysterious manoeuvres.

"You visit none but my enemies," said the Emperor one day to Junot, who was thunderstruck. Up to this time, this speech, a very common one, had been addressed only to me, and so little consequence did I attach to it that I had begun to take no notice of it whatever. But Junot was more astonished than I was in the habit of being at the strange reproach that was addressed to him, and he made no answer. "Yes," repeated the Emperor, "you visit only my enemies; what is the meaning of this whist party which you have drawn together, and which is composed of persons all objectionable to me?" "This whist party, Sire, is composed of the same persons who played at M. de Talleyrand's, and I never heard of your Majesty having addressed such reproaches to him. I suppose they were all reserved for me."

"But," said Napoleon, "can you explain to me why you visit at a certain house in the Faubourg Saint Germain, where I am so much detested, to speak plainly, that I worst of the argument. "Why do you visit at Madame de Luynes's, where you pass your day, and where you allow yourself to be made game of by giddy girls, who think themselves privileged by their sex to play with impunity with the sword of one of my bravest soldiers? How long may they have thought this possible? Ah! ah! Monsieur Junot! . . . you see that I know all. . . . I am thoroughly well informed."

On hearing the name of Madame de Luynes, Junot did not at first know what to think of it; but his surprise soon gave way to so painful a feeling that he drew a deep sigh, putting his hands before his eyes. The Emperor, believing him self-convicted, and that he was at a loss for a defense, repeated:

"Yes, yes; I am perfectly well informed; you cannot deny it." "Sire," said Junot at length, with great solemnity of manner, "I feel myself obliged to tender my resignation to your Majesty; for it is impossible I can continue my services about your person when you will give credit to all the absurd falsehoods which are reported to you respecting my wife and myself. You would believe me in a conspiracy against you if they were to bring you a report to that effect!"

Junot's expression in making this last remark affected Napoleon, who answered mildly: "That is a very different affair." "By no means, Sire, as your Majesty will probably understand when I tell you that my wife and I have been but once to the Hôtel de Luynes. My wife, it is true, was well acquainted with Madame de Chevreuse before her marriage, but her political opposition has been so public that Madame Junot has not sought a renewal of the connection. With respect to allowing myself to be played upon by giddy girls, I am not aware of having hitherto given much cause for supposing that I should

I have already said that, during the Emperor's absence at Warsaw, Junot, to console himself in his widowhood, had renewed the whist parties of M. de Talleyrand. M. de Narbonne belonged to them, and, being already our friend, became a constant member of these meetings, and, indeed, from this time took up the habit of coming to my house every morning and evening. He once said to me: "You were acquainted with Madame de Chevreuse when she was Mademoiselle de Narbonne; then why are you strangers now? I am sure you would suit each other."

I objected that, having never been intimate with Madame de Chevreuse, I could not choose a moment when her opposition to the existing state of things was so marked, to open a new acquaintance with her, although otherwise nothing would be more agreeable to me.

"But she is a Lady of the Palace," said the Count.

"That," replied I, "is precisely my objection."

"But why? Is it a part of your protocol of Imperial etiquette that the Ladies of the Palace are to comply with his Majesty's will, even when he says to them: 'Come and embrace me'? Did not you refuse?"

"Yes, certainly," said I, laughing; "but that is not the present question."

"I beg your pardon, Madame la Gouvernante, Ermesinde does not even conspire against the Emperor's peace, but is content, with many others, to admire him at a distance; for when this lion of yours yawns and stretches out his paw, I am always afraid of coming within his reach. Come, let us seduce you to the Hôtel de Luynes."

I wished to go for old friendship's sake, but made no agreement to do so, and was some days afterward much surprised by receiving an invitation to a ball there.

"Shall you go?" asked Junot.

"Undoubtedly, if you have no objection."

me: in relating this history to the Emperor, I remarked to him that so far was I from intimacy at the Hôtel de Luynes, that I did not feel myself privileged even to ask admission for Madame de Lallemand, who was then a part of my family. Madame Zayoncheck was to call upon me at ten o'clock; she was punctual, and found me promenading my room in great discontent, my hair dressed, my feet in full trim, and waiting for my gown, which had not arrived.

Who does not know the annoyance of waiting? but there is one much more serious, even alarming to think of—that of having your husband before you, full dressed, ready to set off, and laughing at you. Madame Zayoncheck found me in that state which just precedes tears. “Oh, pray!” she exclaimed, “do not cry; they must see you in your best looks.”

But when she heard the subject of my chagrin, away flew her sympathy at once, and she joined in Junot’s rail-lery. “Parbleu!” said the Emperor, interrupting me; “I should have done the same thing: what possessed you that you could only go out in this one new gown? But the women are all alike. You had perhaps a hundred in your wardrobe, for you pass for the most expensive woman at Court in matters of dress.”

“But, Sire, I had not one that was all white; and I have already had the honor of telling your Majesty that I would not so much as admit a green leaf among the flowers that were to trim it.”

“Why not? you were not going to make your First Communion?”

“But I was in mourning for my mother-in-law, and I would not throw it off; neither would I give this reason to Junot, or his good-tempered raillery and all his gayety would have been changed to melancholy.”

The Emperor looked at me in silence for several seconds, and then said, with a significant nod of the head

"No, Sire, I had no saber; but your Majesty member that I was in presence of a two-edged sword that I had some difficulty in defending myself from attacks; and it seems to me that you are willing to fight them; this is not generous . . . three against one."

He laughed in that suppressed tone, resembling that of a ventriloquist, which he assumed sometimes when he was in high good-humor, and at length said: "Wipe your white shoes, let me hear all."

"Well, Sire, I had them on; and I walked about in a little cambric petticoat, my head garlanded with violets and diamond ears of corn."

All this time Junot, who was outwardly making a show of patience, but actually getting into a passion, was dancing a waltz or the "Grandfather"; and time, which was doing nothing, pursued its course, till the clock struck twelve. Junot yawned, stretched himself, and declared he would go to bed. The weather was dreadful, the rain fell in torrents and beating violently against the wind. He desired Mademoiselle Reidler to take the carriage, which was waiting in the courtyard and go directly to Madame Germon's. Junot wished me good night.

"You would do better," said Madame Zayonchegg, "to go to the Hôtel de Luynes, announce Madame Junot's approaching arrival, and make her excuses on the plea of ill disposition."

"No, no," replied Junot, "that might do in a place where we were more intimate, but at that of Madame de Luynes, whom I scarcely know at all, it would not be right. If Laura thinks with me, we shall not go to-night."

While he was speaking we heard hasty steps approaching, and Madame Germon's workwoman came in; she had been to fetch her in a hackney coach. I was angry, but when I saw the green taffety dress, I

"Brurrrr! . . . Altro, figlia mia! Can we ever be sure of anything with a woman? Good night, Laura; I am going to bed."

My look of consternation, I suppose, put him into a better humor, for he burst into a great fit of laughing. Then, resuming his serious look, he turned me round, took me by the arm, and, placing me again before the glass, pointed to a large green spot as big as my two hands, at one side of the skirt of my gown, upon the handsome point flounce. Let the men who chance to read this imagine it as much as they please, it is impossible for them to understand the excess of my distress; none but a woman, and a young woman, too, for the impressions of a ball night may be forgotten, can conceive the effect this vile spot produced upon me. It was so great that I had not even power to be angry, and I asked Mademoiselle Augustine, with apparent composure, how she came to do this piece of mischief.

She said that in coming out from Madame Germon's house she had to take twenty steps in the street to fetch a coach, and as it rained in torrents the unfortunate green taffety had stained the crape. But while in the act of speaking she was at work; and in ten minutes the stained point was taken off and replaced, and the quick trot of two of the most mettlesome carriage horses in Paris was rolling us toward the Rue Saint Dominique.

The balls were so very numerous this year that to come at so late an hour was not a matter of any surprise; and M. de Narbonne, in quality of relation to Madame de Chevreuse, and my very intimate friend, undertook to introduce me to Madame de Luynes. "MADAME LA GOUVERNANTE DE PARIS," said he to the Duchess, in the most serious tone possible.

Madame de Luynes, whom I had often seen at the minute. The young Duc de Chevreuse passed unnoticed in the house, though by no means invisible.

The Duchesse de Chevreuse became immediately after her marriage the most remarkable person of the Faubourg Saint Germain, and the true mistress of the Hôtel de Luynes; for her mother-in-law had eyes and ears but for her, and wished to please her only.

The Duchesse de Luynes was herself a singular character; she was Mademoiselle de Laval-Montmorency, sister of the Duc de Laval so thoroughly accomplished in all games, and had been beautiful as an angel till she caught the smallpox after coming out of the convent where she had received her education. From that hour so great was the change in her face that she considered the part of a woman to be no longer worth performing, and in its stead took to horses and dogs, leaping, hunting, narrowly escaping a broken neck, and recommencing her wild freaks the next day. "I am glad to hear it," said the Duc de Laval, when made acquainted with her first pregnancy, "as it proves that my sister is a woman." Her heart was, however, always a woman's, a faithful friend, and loving all whom it was her duty to love with an excess of tenderness.

Madame de Chevreuse was one of those persons whose name belongs to the history of her era; but the true dignity of female character is scarcely compatible with the ridiculous scenes of which she was every day the heroine, and of which her own brothers disapproved so highly as even to reprove her in public, as on the occasion of her betting that she would stop her brother Alberic at eleven o'clock at night in the midst of the Palais Royal. She did so, but he reprimanded her so roughly that she burst into tears.

Once, having heard that a retired grocer was expecting his niece by the diligence from Rouen, she presented her-cal beggar to whom everyone was in the habit of giving a penny on Sunday at the door of the Church of St. Roche.

A volume might be made of the adventures, the complications of all kinds, contrived and carried out by Madame de Chevreuse; it is inconceivable that she should have destroyed her reputation a thousand times over. We know that these amusements are not criminal; but to show a complete contempt for the opinion of the world. Then Madame de Chevreuse was impertinent, not probably, as a habit but from any real intention of being so; but an impertinent woman I consider to be out of her place in the creation. The protection of Madame de Luynes was of immense weight in the world in which the world measures the worth of women. Without Madame de Luynes, Madame de Chevreuse had been lost!

On the evening of this ball at the Hôtel de Clugny Madame de Chevreuse was in the midst of an increasing incense of flattery, which might well have given her a stronger head than hers. In Paris fashion governs all things; and at this moment it was the pleasure of the society of the Faubourg Saint Germain to elect Madame de Chevreuse as the standard bearer of fashion. For example, as her head was dressed in a very new style to conceal a wig which she had substituted for her red hair, all the ladies of the Faubourg Saint Germain, even Madame de Montmorency herself, adopted the same unbecoming headdress.

The make of their dresses also differed much from that of the Court circle: the sleeves were larger and the skirts longer. On this evening Madame de Chevreuse wore a dress of white blond over white satin. An immense collar ornamented with a single row of large pearls surrounded her hair; her earrings and necklace were of pearls, and "I did not say it was not; I have told her the same thing myself long ago."

"And what is the object of this resolution?"

"To have a child—and for the same reason she has abjured the theaters."

I remembered that for a long time I had not seen her at the Comédie Française; and this famous vow soon after prevented her attending the Empress to the opera.

She was very polite to me, though not quite so friendly as Madame de Luynes, who in recommending me to the attentions of M. de Narbonne, added: "You will meet here, Madame, many old faces who will remind you of the traditions of your cradle."

M. de Narbonne led me into a room devoted entirely to cards, and placing me opposite one of the tables, "Look," said he, "at the lady who sits next to M. de Saint Foix, and is at this moment speaking to him in rather a masculine voice."

"What am I to make of her?" said I; "she is the most comical figure in the room, and, moreover, very ugly."

Her dress was singularly different from that of any other person present, and her face was excessively ugly, with the exception of a pair of very fine eyes. She was playing with a degree of interest almost amounting to passion at the game of vingt et un. "What a strange figure!" I continued; "I cannot describe to you the impression she makes upon me. Is she a good woman?"

"As wicked as five hundred devils, and she has as much spirit as they."

"So I should think. But tell me who she is."

"Guess; she has been loved, adored, because she has been charming."

"I am the stupidest creature imaginable at solving such enigmas; so if you wish me to know her name you may as well tell me."

At this moment she caught the eye of M. de Narbonne, who smiled. A ray of intelligence passed over his face, and he smiled and embellished them at once. Then, as he was holding his arm, and knowing that I was at the Hôtel de Luynes, she surveyed me from head to foot with such an expression of impertinent curiosity that I thought her ten times more ugly than ever. "Let us go away," said I to M. de Narbonne, "I am disgusted at this woman."

"She has frightened a great many other people more courageous than you," said Comte Louis; "I have known the sense that is in that head! and I have known her talent for amusing! There belonged to her a beauty she frequented in London a beautiful young woman as stupid as a cabbage. Madame de Balby is a very silly people, and there I am quite of her opinion. For the simpleton, all the world was not made; everybody must live; one of my friends, who was himself of the brightest, attached himself to a simpleton woman; and as these sorts of attachments are a matter for everlasting conversation, one day he said something better to say, he told her that Comte de Balby was calling her a simpleton everywhere. As this was not right, he thought it better to war-

"'It is terrible,' said she, 'I AM SURE I AM NOT HER SO; what must I do?' For two such days of council about Madame de Balby was too long, and the result soon appeared. The Beauty meeting Comte de Balby two days afterward at a dinner at the Hôtel de Wales's, called out to her across the table, 'which she intended should be very touching. I offended you, Madame?' Madame de Balby looked at her with astonishment, and all the company looked at her. 'Yes,' continued the young woman, 'I must tell you for you tell everyone that I am a simpleton.'

“Who?”

“The Comte de Lille.”

“Perhaps not. But that is no answer to my question: was he fond of her?”

“He loved nothing. His heart was the coldest, and his conversation the most wearisome of any man I ever met with. He had a mistress for ton, for whom he cared nothing. However, having been informed that his Montepan was amusing herself by laying traps for hearts at Hamburg, MONSIEUR, who has a mania for writing, and whose compositions are the dullest and most prolix that can be imagined, wrote her a letter of twelve pages, in which he descanted upon the commerce of Hamburg, not in the first instance on that which she was carrying on, but, like a good and wise Prince, upon that of sugar and coffee, till, winding by degrees to the delicate subject, he told her that he had heard with much pain reports which he had no doubt were false relative to her association with Ar—— de Pe——, and finished his strange letter with this eloquent sentence: ‘You are innocent, I know; but, my dear Countess, remember that Cæsar’s wife must not even be suspected.’ You will have seen by the story of La Belle et Le Bête that my old friend is sufficiently sharp in her answers; this time her letter contained but three lines; it ran thus: ‘I understand nothing of what your letter contains; for you are not Cæsar, and you know very well that I have never been your wife.’ Eh! Madame la Gouvernante, how do you like this retort?”

“So well that, in spite of her frightful little cap and wicked air, I am about to become very partial to Madame de Balby.”

This ball at the Hôtel de Luynes afforded me an opportunity for much observation, but it did not give me pleasure; for the Faubourg Saint Germain had not then

We were to take M. de Narbonne home; he had left our party, and when we were going away was not to be found. We were on the point of leaving him behind, when we caught sight of him with a young person leaning upon his arm, of a very tall and remarkably fine figure, and a face which, without being regularly handsome, was strikingly prepossessing. I do not know from what accidental cause, but she no sooner saw Junot than she complained to M. de Narbonne of his having offended her.

M. de Narbonne having given her into the care of his sister, the Duchesse de Fitz-James, came to join us and taxed Junot on the subject, who was not a little astonished, as he had very much admired this tall and fine young woman, who proved to be Miss Dillon, now the Comtesse Bertrand, to whom, as well as to her husband, all France owes its love and veneration, as the only beings who, besides Marchand, gave ease to the Emperor's last moments. Junot not only admired Miss Dillon, but he had an interest in her as being then the affianced bride of our friend Alphonzo Pignatelli, brother of the Comte de Fuentes; this was a claim upon his regard, and Junot, who was always something more than polite toward the ladies, was as much so to her as propriety would admit.

The next day notes were written on both sides. The whole affair proved to have been an accident. Miss Dillon did not even know Junot when M. de Narbonne named him, and as she was thoroughly amiable, everything was amicably explained. She turned Junot's head. "That young friend of yours is a charming woman," said he to Count Louis.

I have related all the particulars of this little history to found upon it the just observation that the Emperor was surrounded by men who, without consideration for him, misinterpreted all the actions of his friends and reported "And the history of Miss Dillon is exactly as you have told it?"

"Exactly, Sire."

"It is very extraordinary."

And the Emperor, I afterward learned from Duroc, sharply reprimanded his faithless correspondent.

Junot's Departure for Bordeaux, and Subsequently for Portugal—Secret Instructions Relative to the Portuguese Campaign—General Loison—His Accusations against Junot—Colonel Napier—Predilections in Favor of England—Charles X. at the Exhibition of National Industry—Convention of Cintra—Fêtes at Fontainebleau—The Emperor's New Amours—His Solitary Rides in the Forest—His Dislike to Attendance—Melancholy Presentiments of the Empress—Duroc's Hostility to Her—Interview at Mantua between Napoleon and Lucien—The Imperial Brother and the Republican Brother—Lucien's Ideas of Kingly Duties—The Parting—Scene at Malmaison in 1804—Lucien's Prediction.

JUNOT at length set out, on the 28th of August, 1807, for Bordeaux. He received secret instructions at great length from the Emperor before his departure, and further orders were to be sent to him at Bordeaux, on the receipt of which he set out for Portugal, and his army had already passed Alcantara before the people of Paris were aware of its destination. Not only were the ministerial orders precise, but the private letters of the Emperor were peremptory in requiring the utmost possible celerity in his march upon Lisbon, and that he should make great sacrifices to obtain the predominant the first campaign of Portugal, for there were three, and, as Junot's wife, I must protest against either the second or third being attributed to him), offered nothing but discouragement and annoyance to my husband. Jealousy and envy erected a barrier to prevent his glory penetrating to the land of his cradle. There were generals in his army whose names were on the laurel leaves which composed the triumphal garland of France; these brave and talented men were true brethren-in-arms to their Commander-in-Chief.

At their head was the Duc de Valmy, the valiant and loyal General Kellerman, who, conscious of his own assured glory, dreaded not that of others. To him I may add the Generals Laborde, Thiébault, Quesnel, Taviel, and many others. But General Loison and another who shall be nameless were so lost to all generous sentiments as to become the accusers of a man who had loaded them with favors and honors; that other, whose perfidy to Junot was without cause, without even the slightest pretext, and who professed gratitude to him for the gift of a considerable sum of money, which now constitutes the greater part of his fortune, materially injured not Junot only, but also Ney in Masséna's campaign, when I was present and detected his intrigues.

When, some years afterward, arranging my notes relative to this campaign, anxious to render my narrative impartial, especially as regards one of the great names of our military history, and being unable to reconcile the various conflicting rumors respecting Marshal Soult and his desire to possess himself of the Portuguese crown, which had reached me while with the army, I called one day on La Maréchale, as I always prefer the most direct course, and related to her, and also to that loyal and frank soldier Colonel Bory de St. Vincent, attached to the answers to your queries. Will that suit you?" I gladly assented; but Madame Soult objected that he might spare both himself and me the trouble by giving me the work of Colonel Napier and General Matthieu Dumas, the accuracy of which might be depended upon, and I should have but to copy what was already printed. I accepted the book, though not without regret that the Marshal's offer had failed of its accomplishment.*

On my road home I racked my brain to discover whence this Colonel Napier could come, of whom I had never heard; it was not till I arrived and opened the first of the four volumes, which as a former comrade, the Duchess of Dalmatia had been kind enough to lend me, that the marvelous truth was explained; he was an Englishman! Having been referred to this work for information, I made it a duty to read it attentively. On the principal object of my inquiry it was silent, or at least contained but two or three chance observations respecting the contested question of the Portuguese royalty.

But I was not a little astonished to find in the work to which I had been thus officially referred, an account of the campaign written in a spirit most inimical to the French, and especially to Junot. That campaign, the glory of which is recognized not only throughout Europe, but across the Atlantic, was acknowledged even by the rage of our enemies, who granted AN INQUIRY as their only recompense to Sir Arthur Wellesley. General Thiébault, the Chief of Junot's Staff, and son of that friend of the great Frederick who has left us so admirable a work upon the miraculous days of Prussia's exaltation, knew more, I imagine, of this expedition and of its commander than M. Napier, and when such a man as Thiébault, with a heart truly French, a noble mind, and talents as remarkable in the cabinet as was his valor in the field, preserved laid in the earth, it may well be believed that who was worthy of such attachment and of the affection of all who belonged to him was not what Colonel Oudinot has represented him.

In 1814 the Comte d'Artois uttered the memorable words: "I AM ONLY ONE FRENCHMAN THE MORE" in a declaration worthy of Bayard or of Francis I. But at the Exhibition of NATIONAL INDUSTRY in 1827, Charles X, many years older, replied with a smile to one of our most skillful armorers, who presented him with a new sword: "I THANK YOU, BUT I SELDOM USE ANY BUT OLD ARMS."

And further on, when a Lyons shawl manufacturer was displaying to him some admirable specimens: "Your neighbors far surpass us. We cannot contend with them." "I have the honor to beg your Majesty's pardon," he answered the manufacturer with spirit, deeply sensible of this unjust reproach; "for more than six years past your factory in Lyons sends to England five hundred thousand francs' worth of these very manufactures which your Majesty considers so inferior to the English."

This incident may serve to show that there was no change when the Court weathercock pointed northwest, and that the courtiers were obliged to sing "God Save the King" as well as even "Rule Britannia"; it was natural enough that articles to the supremacy of England should then be deposited in the library of the War Minister; but that they should remain the same after the Revolution of 1793 was a little too bad.

When Junot had once accepted the command, he was resolved to justify the Emperor's confidence; and, although his health was seriously impaired, he did not suffer in position to interfere with the most minute attention to the concerns of his army. But with Napoleon blame him, rigid as was the requisition; it was upon such principles he made the world his Empire.

The fêtes in celebration of the King of Westphalia's marriage still continued, and the Court of Fontainebleau was more brilliant than during the reign of Louis XIV., each successive day exceeding the past in magnificence. I was patiently awaiting my confinement at Raincy when I received an invitation, or rather an order, to repair to Fontainebleau for a few days. I obeyed; but not choosing to be an inmate of the château, I hired a small house close adjoining, and went every day to the Palace in a sedan chair; although Duroc had told me in confidence that the Emperor, whom I certainly feared the most, was about to set out on a journey.

No language can convey a clear idea of the magnificence, the magical luxury, which now surrounded the Emperor; the diamonds, jewels, and flowers, that gave splendor to his fêtes; the loves and joys that spread enchantment around, and the intrigues which the actors in them fancied quite impenetrable, whereas they were perhaps even more easily discernible than at the Tuileries. When the mornings were fine, and in October and November of that year the weather was superb, we went out hunting and breakfasted in the forest. The ladies wore a uniform of chamois cashmere, with collars and trimmings of green cloth, embroidered with silver, and a hat of black velvet, with a large plume of white feathers.

Nothing could be more exhilarating than the sight of seven or eight open carriages whirling rapidly through the alleys of that magnificent forest, filled with ladies in this elegant costume, their waving plumes blending harmoniously with the autumnal foliage; the Emperor and his numerous suite darting like a flight of arrows past them in pursuit of a stag which exhibiting at one moment its whispers. The present was the very important subject of the Emperor's new amours. The beautiful Genoese, then at the acme of favor, had demanded to be presented at Court, which no other favorite had ever dared to think of; and the Emperor, though usually very little susceptible of influence from such connections, had on this occasion the weakness to accede.

But the future presented a far more serious consideration in the Imperial divorce, which occupied all minds, and was the subject of our conversation in the retirement of our own apartments. The designated Heir of the Empire was no more; and, though he had left a brother, Napoleon's hopes did not rest equally on him. He became thoughtful and abstracted, and would often ride into the forest in the morning, attended only by Jardin (his favorite pricker, who was much devoted to him), probably that he might meditate undisturbed upon the course he should adopt.

"How can you suffer the Emperor to ride almost alone in that forest?" said I one day to Duroc; "once in a way it would be immaterial, but if it is known to be habitual he may be watched for, and how easily may a mischance occur!" "I cannot hinder his going out unaccompanied," replied Duroc. "I have several times remonstrated, but he will not listen. I am, however, informed the moment he leaves the Palace, and do my best to watch over his safety. But the forest is large, and there is no ascertaining what direction he may choose, so that these solitary rides often cause me uneasiness."

This may serve as an answer to the assertions in some biographies as to the extreme vigilance with which it was the Emperor's pleasure to be uniformly guarded. He had always the greatest repugnance to attendance; even in seasons of real danger I have seen him going out con-attachment to Madame G—— he had also a great fancy for Madame B——, who, as a lady in waiting on one of the princesses, attended all the hunting parties, and frequently breakfasted at the rendezvous. I know the whole of that affair, and can assert, in opposition to the reports of scandal, that the Emperor never succeeded; though so powerful was the impression made upon him that he committed it to writing, a circumstance very rare with him in his transient entanglements, for such this would have been, had not Madame B—— had the good sense to withstand the infatuation of that halo of glory, that cloud of dazzling light which surrounded Napoleon.

The Empress, in spite of all her efforts to appear gay and happy, was overpowered with melancholy. The rumors of a divorce seemed to acquire more and more consistency, and were all repeated to her; the frequent exchange of couriers between Paris and Petersburg inspired a fear that the consummation of the peace of Tilsit might be sought in a family alliance between the new friends; and, to complete her uneasiness upon the subject, she dared not mention it to the Emperor.

Once when I had been paying my respects to her, she did me the honor to say to me: "Madame Junot, they will never be satisfied till they have driven me from the throne of France—they are inveterate against me." She meant the Emperor's family. And in fact her two sisters-in-law, Jerome, and all to whom, as they said, the glory of the Empire was dear, desired a separation. The Emperor himself said nothing, but his silence was perhaps more alarming to his unfortunate consort than words would have been. The death of the young Prince of Holland had evidently overthrown all his projects.

The Empress burst into tears as she contemplated a lock of the child's beautiful yellow hair, which she had tice in blaming him for the revenge he took for the press's former opposition to his intended marriage. On that day, as the Empress entered the throne room, her sad and disconsolate looks seemed to be bidding every object on which they turned. I asked, "How can you avoid pitying her?" He looked a moment, as if in reproach; then taking my hand, directed my attention to the extremity of the salon, where a lady was seated, another standing by her side.

"Look there," whispered he; "that one is Heaven, the other is Hell! Whose doing is that? Is it mine? No, no! I have no compassion for her!" I have no objection to Duroc's sentiments because, with his prodigious influence over the Emperor, he had much power of influencing the Empress; his hostility, I am certain, was active; but there are circumstances in which such conduct is the most deadly injury.

We were informed one morning that the Emperor had set out at four o'clock on a journey, the object and duration of which were alike impenetrable. Yet this was the only direction he could have taken; and, in fact, the principal though latent motive of this journey was the reconciliation with Lucien. The Emperor was so convinced, or rather he had never doubted, that only his brothers, Lucien alone could understand and act in concert with him. But Lucien was far from yielding to the Emperor, who knew his character, resolved not to see and converse with him; the brothers consequently gave each other a rendezvous at Mantua. Lucien departed about nine at night in a traveling carriage with his cousin-german of his first wife, and the Comte de Melon, a friend who resided with him. "Do not suppose we shall probably return to-night!" said Lucien, as he was to join his brother.

it now passed before his mental vision, his noble heart beat responsively.

For some moments he was incapable of speaking; at length, having expressed to Napoleon his pleasure in this meeting, the Emperor made a signal and the rest of the party withdrew. "Well, Lucien," said Napoleon, "what are your projects? Will you at last go hand in hand with me?" Lucien regarded him with astonishment; for inquiries into his projects, addressed to him who never indulged in any, appeared most strange. "I form no projects," replied he at length. "As for going hand in hand with your Majesty, what am I to understand by it?"

An immense map of Europe lay rolled up on a table before them; the Emperor seized it by one end, and throwing it open with a graceful action, said to Lucien: "Choose any kingdom you please, and I pledge you my word, as a brother and an Emperor, to give it you, and to maintain you in it . . . for I now ride over the head of every king in Europe. Do you understand me?" He stopped and looked expressively at Lucien.

"Lucien, you may share with me that sway which I exercise over inferior minds; you have only to pursue the course I shall open to you for the establishment and maintenance of my system, the happiest and most magnificent ever conceived by man; but to insure its execution I must be seconded, and I can only be seconded by my own family; of all my brothers only yourself and Joseph can efficiently serve me. Louis is an obstinate fool,* and Jerome a mere child without capacity. . . . My hopes, then, rest chiefly on you; will you realize them?" "Before this explanation is carried further," answered Lucien, "I ought to inform you that I am not changed; my principles are still the same as in 1799 and 1803. What I was in my curule chair on the 18th Bru-come here and theorize about your Utopian Republic! You must embrace my system, I tell you; follow my path, and to-morrow I make you the chief of a great people. I will acknowledge your wife as my sister; I will crown her as well as you. I will make you the greatest man in Europe, next to myself, and I restore you my entire friendship, my brother," added he, lowering the emphatic tone in which he had just uttered the preceding sentences to that soft and caressing accent I have never heard but from his lips, and which makes the heart vibrate. The man was altogether fascinating. Lucien loved him; he started as he listened, and grew pale.

"I will not sell myself," said he in an agitated voice. "Hear me, my brother, listen to me; for this is an important hour to both of us. I will never be your prefect. If you give me a kingdom, I must rule it according to my own notions, and, above all, in conformity with its wants. The people whose chief I may be shall have no cause to execrate my name. They shall be happy and respected; not slaves, as the Tuscans and all the Italians are. You yourself cannot desire to find in your brother a pliant sycophant, who for a few soft words would sell you the blood of his children; for a people is after all but one large family, whose governor will be held responsible by the King of kings for the welfare of all its members."

The Emperor frowned, and his whole aspect proclaimed extreme dissatisfaction. "Why, then, come to me?" said he at last angrily; "for if you are obstinate, so am I, and you know it; at least as obstinate as you can be. Humph! Republic! You are no more thinking of that than I am; and besides, what should you desire it for? You are like Joseph, who bethought himself the other day of writing me an inconceivable letter, coolly desiring I would allow him to enter upon Kingly duties. Truly nothing more would be wanting than the re-establishment of the internal perturbation: "Always the same! Always the same!" Then turning suddenly to his brother and stamping on the marble floor, he exclaimed with a thundering voice: "But once more, sir—why, then, did you come to meet me? Why these endless contentions? You ought to obey me as your father, the Head of your Family; and by Heaven you shall do as I please."

Lucien was now growing warm, and all the discretion he had summoned to his aid was beginning to evaporate. "I am no subject of yours," cried he in his turn, "and if you think to impose your iron yoke upon me you are mistaken; never will I bow my head to it; and remember—hearken to my words—remember what I once told you at Malmaison."

A long, alarming, almost sinister silence succeeded this burst of generous indignation. The two brothers faced each other, and were separated only by the table on which lay that Europe, the sport of Napoleon's infatuated ambition. He was very pale, his lips compressed, the almost livid hue of his cheeks revealing the tempest within, and his eyes darting glances of fury upon Lucien, whose handsome countenance must have shown to great advantage in this stormy interview, which was to decide his future fate; nor his alone, but perhaps that of Europe; for who shall conjecture what might have happened had this really superior man been King of Spain, of Prussia, or of Poland?

The Emperor was the first to break silence; he had mastered his passion, and addressed his brother with calmness: "You will reflect on all that I have told you, Lucien; night brings counsel. To-morrow I hope to find you more reasonable as to the interests of Europe at least, if not your own. Good-bye, and a good night to you, my brother." He held out his hand.

Lucien, whose heart was susceptible to every kindly

The brothers met no more until the hour of Napoleon's adversity.

The scene at Malmaison, to which Lucien alluded in this interview, took place shortly before the Empire was proclaimed, when Napoleon's intentions were already known to his family, and disappointment on finding himself deceived in his calculations of making Lucien one of his most powerful lieutenants served to widen the breach which the marriage of the latter had produced. Lucien, who had hoped to see the happy days of the Forum restored, and could now only look for those of Augustus, was vehement in his reproaches, accused the Emperor of being faithless to him, and of violating his word; in short, the discussion ended in an open quarrel.

"You are determined to destroy the Republic!" exclaimed the enraged Lucien. "Well, assassinate her then; erect your Throne over her murdered remains and those of her children—but mark well what one of those children predicts: This Empire which you are erecting by force, and will maintain by violence, will be overthrown by violence and force, and you yourself will be crushed thus!" and seizing a screen from the mantelpiece he crushed it impetuously in his hand, which trembled with rage. Then, as if still more distinctly to mark his resentment, he took out his watch, dashed it on the ground, and stamped upon it with the heel of his boot, repeating: "Yes; crushed, ground to powder—thus!"

CHAPTER III.

Junot at Lisbon—My Accouchement—The Empress Josephine as Godmother—Imperial Magnificence—The Grand-Duchess of Berg

It continued raining as it generally does in Lisbon at that period of the year (November); Junot was suffering from a nervous complaint arising from his wounds, which was always increased when inquietude of mind was super-added to fatigue of body. The pain of his wounds sometimes made him start from his seat.* He would not, however, allow any personal considerations to impede the accomplishment of his design. He entered Lisbon by the Saccaven gate, viz, by the road opposite the Tower of Belem. He addressed a few private instructions to two grenadier officers who stood near him, directing them to convey his orders to the troops.†

Junot's first object was to take possession of the Tower of Belem. He entered the fort, and, espying a vessel leaving the harbor under a press of sail, he conjectured she had on board the Prince of Brazil or some of his suite. Without losing a moment he loaded, with his own hands, one of the guns of the fort, and directed M. Tascher, his aid-de-camp, to point it. This was done with such precision that the shot passed through the rigging, and compelled the vessel to strike. She, however, had on board no person connected with the Royal Family of Portugal. On his return from Belem, Junot took a survey of the principal parts of Lisbon, and walked for nearly six hours.

When Junot left France for Portugal I was staying at Raincy. My condition afforded me a sufficient excuse for not paying my respects to Madame, and I am bound to say that in this, as in all other circumstances, she behaved with great consideration and kindness toward me. I passed two months at Raincy, and only returned to Paris a few days previous to my accouchement.

I had already given birth to five daughters, and Junot anxiously wished to have a son. The day therefore on Junot, whose blood, like his father's, may flow for his Sovereign and his country."

Junot wished the Emperor to be godfather to his son, though he had already stood godfather to our eldest daughter, but he disliked being sponsor for two in the same family. However, as Junot urged me to prefer the request, I did so. The Emperor granted it with the best possible grace, observing: "I will do as Junot wishes; but who is to be godmother?"

This question was rather embarrassing. The divorce was at this time publicly talked of—at least, as publicly as people dared to talk, under Napoleon's government, of his domestic affairs. However, my embarrassment was not of long duration, and I replied:

"If agreeable to your Majesty, I should wish her Majesty the Empress to stand godmother."

The Emperor fixed upon me for a few moments his keen and penetrating glance, and rejoined:

"Would you not like Signora Lætitia to be godmother?"

"Your Majesty never did me the honor to speak of Madame Mère."

"Well, should you like her to stand?"

"I am," answered I, "ready to obey your Majesty's wishes."

"But this is no reply to my question. Who, I ask again, do you wish to stand godmother to your son?"

"Does your Majesty deign to allow me the choice?"

"I told you so," he replied, "an hour ago."

"Then," said I, "I request her Majesty the Empress to stand godmother to my son."

"Ah!" he responded, and gazed on me steadily for some time; at length he said:

"You wish the Empress to stand? Well, be it so."

The divorce took place in the following year. I have be accounted for when it is recollected that almost all the French generals and the superior officers of the Imperial Guard had married for love, either in France or in other countries, during their campaigns.

I have already spoken of the elegance which embellished the Consular Court; but we have now arrived at the period of the Empire, when that elegance was doubled, nay tripled, in refinement and magnificence. The Emperor's desire was that his Court should be brilliant; and this wish, being agreeable to everyone's taste, was implicitly fulfilled. The revolutionary law which prohibited embroidered coats was now forgotten, and the gentlemen rivaled the ladies in the richness of their dress and the splendor of their jewels.

I well recollect the truly fairy-like or magical appearance of the Salle des Maréchaux on the night of a grand concert, when it was lined on either side by three rows of ladies, radiant in youth and beauty, and all covered with flowers, jewels, and waving plumes. Behind the ladies were ranged the officers of the Imperial Household, and lastly the Generals, the Senators, the Councilors of State, and the Foreign Ministers, clothed in rich costumes and wearing on their breasts the decorations and orders which Europe offered to us on bended knee. At the upper end of the Hall sat the Emperor with the Empress, his brothers, sisters, and sisters-in-law. From that point, he with his keen glance surveyed the plumed and glittering circle.

Paris was unusually brilliant this winter. The various Princes of the Confederation of the Rhine; Germany, Russia, Austria, Poland, Italy, Denmark, and Spain—in a word, all Europe, with the single exception of England, had sent to Paris the élite of their Courts to pay their respects to the Emperor and to fill up the magnificent

Caroline was the planet around which all the youth of the Court used to be grouped, without, however, encroaching upon the gentle and gracious empire of Queen Hortense, who, beloved by all, and adored by those more immediately connected with her, seemed to have formed the subject of M. de la Maisonfort's lively couplet:

*"A chacun elle voulait plaire,
Elle plaisait,
Chacun l'aimait,"* etc.

The affairs of Spain now began to assume a troubled aspect. The thunder which roared over the beauteous plains of Aranjuez resounded even to the courtyards of the Tuileries. The Emperor dispatched the Grand-Duke of Berg to take the command of the troops assembled on the frontiers of Spain.

This departure was by no means agreeable to the Duke. He had contracted habits of gallantry which he was foolish enough to believe were those of a man of fashion, while his connections were really of the lowest and most vulgar kind. He, moreover, made himself an object of ridicule by his affected manners and dress, his curls, his feathers, his furs, and all the wardrobe of a strolling player. The Grand-Duke and the Princess Caroline then occupied the Palais de l'Elysée. At the time of the marriage of the King of Westphalia the Princess Caroline had been in the habit of giving entertainments on a most magnificent scale. The winter which succeeded the marriage was distinguished by less brilliant, though equally agreeable festivities.

The princesses received orders from the Emperor that each severally should give a ball once every week, not that Napoleon was himself fond of dancing, but he liked to see others take part in the amusement. These assemblies were usually composed of from a hundred and fifty excitement they occasioned! What business for the toilet!

We also admitted our children to a share of the pleasure we ourselves enjoyed. I set this example, being the mother of the eldest of the Emperor's goddaughters. My daughter's birthday was the 6th of January (Twelfth Day), and I invited in her name the children of Junot's brother officers, the families of the public authorities, and of my own private friends. On this occasion from 120 to 140 children were brought together, and we engaged for their entertainment General Jacquot, the learned ape, the performing canary birds who fired off a pistol, Fitz-James the ventriloquist, Oliver the juggler, etc. How shall I describe the joy which pervaded this young assembly? What exclamations of delight! what ecstasy! Then we gave them a supper, or, rather, a collation of ices, pastry, and the most exquisite sucreries which could be procured. It was a scene of fairy enchantment!

Sometimes these little parties assembled in masks. One of the most conspicuous figures in the juvenile groups was the young Prince Achille Murat. He was a very fine boy, but a most mischievous little imp, whose boisterous romping manners formed a striking contrast to those of his cousins, the Princes Louis and Napoleon, who were exceedingly sedate. The second, who survived his elder brother, died even in a more distressing manner, at the age of seven-and-twenty. He was a remarkably fine boy. His younger brother,* who is now in Switzerland with his mother, was likewise a very lovely child. We used to call him the PRINCESSE LOUIS, on account of his profusion of fine light hair, which gave him a strong resemblance to his beautiful and amiable mother.

On the occasion of one of our juvenile masquerades my daughters encountered a comical adventure which I will

"Is his Highness aware of your visit, Madame?" said the valet, suddenly turning round to Mademoiselle Poidevin and the young masqueraders.

"Certainly," replied she, "we have been invited here for this fortnight past."

The valet still hesitated for a moment, and then motioning with his head as much as to say, "Ma foi! let him settle the affair himself," he opened the door of the salon and announced in a loud voice, "Mademoiselle Poidevin," for in her confusion she had forgotten to give the servant the names of the children.

The door was no sooner opened than Mademoiselle Poidevin started back with astonishment, and the children instinctively clung to her from alarm.

The room into which the servant was about to usher them was very large and badly lighted. In the middle was an immense round table covered with papers, and round it were seated several solemn-looking gentlemen in black. Among them was an old man, bent down with age. He wore a small black silk mantle, in front of which was an immense silver medal.

The other individuals present seemed neither gayer nor more youthful than the gentleman just described, except perhaps one little man, distinguished by rather an obliquity of vision, and a sort of sarcastic smile, and who, as if regretting that he had only turned his thirtieth year, wore his hair cut en vergette and powdered, quite in the fashion of the last century. All this made a strange impression on my little girls, who had entered the house of Prince Eugène, which, as I before mentioned, was occupied by his Highness the Grand-Duke of Frankfurt, the Prince Primate.

The gentleman with his hair en vergette and powdered was no other than the Duke Dalberg, who was that very evening affianced to the beautiful and accomplished Made-so unexpectedly interrupted the drawing up of Dalberg's marriage contract. The Prince Prim much amused by the mistake, and seemed almost to ask my little Josephine and Constance to dance. Mademoiselle Poidevin, however, retired her pupils, being politely bowed out by the Prince and Duke Dalberg.

Some days after this adventure, Comte Louis de bonne said to me:

"Do you know, Madame Junot, that your error caused terrible consternation the other evening at the Prince Primate's? It was supposed that some mistress of the Duke Dalberg had come with her family to oppose the marriage."

I laughed heartily at the strange mistake. I said I, "his Highness must have been not a little amused by the fantastic costume of the two LITTLE ORPHANS."

On my arrival at Madame Ney's I found the party in the height of gayety: charades and dances kept up till one o'clock, and when the younger part of the company had retired, M. de Grancourt dropped in and amused us for another hour or two.

M. de Grancourt was then a conspicuous character in the beau-monde of Paris, and one of the most celebrated relics of the last century. He was a native of the Rhine land, a man of fortune, and generally known in the society of Europe. In spite of these advantages, both in appearance and manner, one of the most ridiculous and grotesque personages imaginable. His little legs supported an immense body, and his head surmounted by a large profusely powdered and frizzed, like that worn by the actors in the Ecole de Bourgeois, were not, after all, half so ridiculous as his amusing self-conceit and his mania of making himself irresistibly fascinating.

arrived from the country. M. d'Espinchal met them, and asked Grancourt why he was peeping so eagerly through the panes of the boxes.

"It is I, sir," said the country gentleman, "who am giving M. de Grancourt all this trouble. I arranged to meet my wife at the Opera this evening; but I have lost the ticket of the box and forgotten the number, so I am at a loss where to find her."

"Has Madame been long in Paris?" inquired D'Espinchal.

"Only two days."

"On what tier is her box?"

"On the first."

"I will tell you in a few minutes whether she is in the house or not."

M. d'Espinchal opened an empty box, and looked round the theater with his lorgnette. He then went to the opposite side of the theater and did the same. In a few minutes he returned to the gentleman, requested he would follow him, and pointed to a box.

"Ah!" exclaimed the gentleman, "here is my wife!"

"I was sure of it," said M. d'Espinchal.

"But how, sir? you do not know her!"

"That was the very reason I found her out."

The country gentleman stared with astonishment.

"To be sure," added M. d'Espinchal, "your wife is the only lady I do not know among the hundred who are seated in the first tier. Therefore I could not be wrong."

"Well," observed M. de Grancourt, shrugging his shoulders, "this is beyond me!"

is to say, those from the age of twenty to thirty—were passionate admirers of that fertile branch of literature, which opened so many roads to information, and diffused a light over objects hitherto concealed beneath the shade of prejudices called RULES.

Goethe, Schiller, Shakespeare—in short, all the eminent writers of Germany and England—were translated into French, and they imparted a powerful weight to the opinions of Rousseau, Voltaire, Bernardin de Saint Pierre, and André Chenier. Then came a torrent of new literary works, many of them monstrosities, it is true, but which nevertheless served to open a path to those men of real genius whose names will be handed down with honor to posterity. At the head of these may be placed Victor Hugo and his friend Alphonse de Lamartine.

The memories which I have just called up present to me many details in which Napoleon is concerned, which bear reference to literary subjects. Among these recollections there is one in particular which forcibly strikes me. It is an evening I spent at Saint Cloud, on which occasion Napoleon may be said to have played the part of President of the Institute; for he spoke for upward of three hours on literature, and the various resolutions it had undergone. Napoleon was quite a lover of the romantic school, and Ossian was his favorite poet.

It was Sunday, and there was a party at Saint Cloud. All the Emperor's favorite savants were present, and many other individuals whose talent and information eminently qualified them to bear a brilliant part in conversation. Among the company were M. Roederer, M. de la Place, Monge, and Cardinal Maury. M. Chaptal had brought with him the first plates of his "Voyage d'Egypte." M. de Lacépède was also one of the company, and I have some recollection that Cuvier was there too.

The object of this extraordinary convocation of talent

the opinions entertained by Monge on certain points, yet he sincerely loved and esteemed that celebrated man.

The reader has seen how the scientific and literary conversation of the soirée at Saint Cloud insensibly became political. The little storm which the remark of Monge had produced suddenly interrupted it, and for several minutes nothing was heard in the salon bleu but the voice of the Empress—who was conversing in a low tone with some of the ladies—and the footsteps of the Emperor, who paced up and down, taking his eternal pinches of snuff.

At length he suddenly turned to the Cardinal, and said, with an inexplicable mixture of severity and raillery: "You maintain, Cardinal, that the morals of the people have become more corrupt during the last fifty years; but if I were to prove to you positively the reverse, what would you say?" "Sire, I should say nothing," replied the Cardinal, resuming his confidence; "for to resist proof would be a mark of the most perverse spirit. If I should be convinced by your Majesty, I shall have nothing to say in reply; but let us see the proof." "Well, I would first ask whether, when you speak of the whole French people, you mean only the population of Paris? That population may, it is true, be counted as ten to one on the day of an insurrection; but, apart from that, you must grant that the civic and commercial population of the capital amounts only to two hundred thousand individuals, men, women, and children. Among this number there may certainly be exceptions. The old customs that were hidden beneath the triple spider webs which the Revolution swept away, the old customs destroyed in certain families of the Rue Saint Denis or the Rue du Marais, are no doubt regretted by those families. But enlarge the circle around you; go into the country and the neighborhood of the convents and ask the village elders how the Benedictines and the Four Mendicant Orders used to teach morality to females."

sides. But I will not exclusively attack the monks and priests in speaking of the morality of the tiers-état period we are referring to. I will ask you how it raised its voice to defend itself when attacked by the noblesse, and commanded like slaves, to bow down to their superiors. Nothing was secure against the caprice of a libertine, and at that time every young man was a libertine of the most lawless kind. For example, the Duc de Richelieu, burning a whole town for an hour's amusement! Who is it says—

“Pour les plaisirs d'un jour, que tout Paris périr”

Is it not Rousseau?”

“No, Sire, it is Gilbert.” “When did he live?” “He was contemporary with La Harpe, D'Alembert, and Voltaire. In that same satire which your Majesty has quoted he alludes to La Harpe in the line which has been so often repeated—

“Tomba de chute en chute au trône académique.”

“Pardieu!” exclaimed the Emperor. “La Harpe truly he said to have usurped his reputation. He was a greater atheist than any of the coterie of Baron d'Holbach and the Encyclopædists. He was the mean and flatterer of Voltaire; and he afterward made assertions which were absurd and contemptible, for they were the result of conviction. Did you know him?”

The Cardinal replied in the affirmative; and, as an experienced courtier, he began to pronounce a funeral oration on La Harpe, which was characterized by nothing but Christian charity. I could not help remarking that in his “Cours de Littérature” La Harpe speaks in terms of the panegyrics of Cardinal Maury, when only an Abbé, he delivered them on Saint Louis at Saint Vincent de Paul before the King. The

When I entered the salon the Emperor was speaking with great warmth; he was addressing himself to Cardinal Maury, who was always very much disposed to controversy, and who was not more courteous to the Emperor than he was to M. Brockhausen, the Prussian Ambassador, to whom he once said: "Monsieur, the fact is, Racine cannot be understood in Prussia for a century to come." His abruptness of manner and loud thundering voice always made me dread a literary or political discussion in which he took part, notwithstanding his talent for conversation.

The discussion had fallen, I cannot tell how, on the moral corruption of the French language. Napoleon by instinct could speak correctly on such a subject, but he was not competent to maintain an argument with a man like the Cardinal. Every voice was hushed except those of the two interlocutors, and not a word that fell from either of them was lost. Napoleon maintained that the change which had taken place in our language was an inevitable consequence of the influence of morals. The Cardinal replied that the question was not to determine the effect produced, but to inquire into the causes which had led to that effect.

"Probity, virtue, filial respect," said he — "in short, all that forms the basis of every well-constructed social edifice has been destroyed, never to be recovered; and I am of opinion that this destruction has exercised a powerful influence on the corruption of language, for I presume that your Majesty does not regard the change that has taken place as a defect tending merely to strip the language of its primitive and original character?"

This question seemed to be a sort of challenge addressed to the Roi législateur. Napoleon looked steadfastly at the Cardinal, and, with an expression which I cannot describe, exclaimed: "Surely, Cardinal, you do not imagine that I, the

"Will your Majesty permit me to observe," res Cardinal, "that two classes at least, the citizens peasantry, are very different with respect to purity from what they were fifty years ago?—and those make up the bulk of the population." "You are Cardinal, you are wrong," observed the Emperor. "But what do you mean when you talk of purity in the class of citizens? Do you allude to the per Madame du Barry was demoiselle de boutique?" "haps," said Monge, "the Cardinal alludes to when the citizens went to mass and the peasants tithes." I shall never forget the glance which cast upon Monge at this moment—it was as elo a whole speech.

Monge, who, like Volney, Dolomieu, and other of the day, was a decided atheist, had mistaken the ror's drift, and had made a remark that was any appropriate. He ought not to have forgotten the remonstrance he received from the Emperor for decorous bonmot which fell from him in reference dispute between the Curé of Saint Roche and formers of the Opera on the occasion of the Mademoiselle Chameroi. "AFTER ALL," said Mon BUT A QUARREL BETWEEN ACTOR AND ACTOR.

digression, the scientific subjects, for the discussion of which the party had been assembled, were again touched upon. Incompetent as I was to speak on such learned topics, I was obliged to answer a question put to me by the Emperor respecting M. de Fenaigle, the professor of mnemonics. I had repeated to the Empress a number of absurd things which I had heard from Fenaigle, whom Napoleon did not like.

As to Dr. Gall, he despised him, and had no faith in his system. He was just then beginning in France to acquire the great reputation which he has left behind him. I had received Dr. Gall on his arrival in France; for, as the wife of the Governor of Paris, I thought it my duty to show attention to a man who was reputed to have made great and useful discoveries in science. One day, when he was dining at my house, I requested him to examine the head of my little son, who was then six weeks old. The child was brought in, his cap was taken off, and the doctor, after an attentive examination of his head, said, in a solemn tone: "This child will be a great mathematician." This prediction has certainly not been verified. My eldest son, on the contrary, possesses a brilliant and poetic imagination. It is possible that he might have been a mathematician had he been forced to that study; but certainly the natural bent of his mind would never have led him to calculations and the solution of problems.

Monge and the Cardinal, knowing my intimacy with Dr. Gall, asked me some questions respecting him. I was aware of the Emperor's opinion of the Doctor and his system, and therefore I was not surprised when, turning to me, he said in a tone of disapproval: "So, Madame Junot, you patronize Dr. Gall. Well, you are Gouvernante of Paris, and I suppose you must show attention to MEN OF SCIENCE, even though they be fools

It may then be ascertained as soon as a child into the world what he is destined to be, and should have the organs of murder or theft very marked, he may be immediately drowned, as they used to drown the crooked-legged and the hunchback.

The Emperor considered the system of Dr. destructive of all order and of all law. Soon after the doctor's return from Germany he inquired of the President of the Institute if there was not one among them so courageous to refute "the foolish doctrine of Dr.

ONE day the Emperor sent me word, by Duroc, that he wished to speak to me, and that I must be at the Tuileries at half-past four. I looked at my watch and questioned him with my eyes. He smiled, and said, "to fear nothing." "It is, I believe," said he, "a business which does not concern Junot's interests at least."

"I was thinking of taking a drive," replied the Princess; "but I will postpone it, and stay at home. The conversation which the Emperor wishes to have with you renders me anxious on Junot's account. Be sure to return immediately, and tell me the result. If there should be any need of my influence, you know I am always ready to employ it in favor of you and your excellent husband."

Having given Madame my promise to return and render her an account of my conference, I left the palace at a quarter past four for the Tuileries.

The Emperor was engaged at a Council of State, which did not break up until six o'clock. This unexpected delay afforded me ample time to revolve in my mind every probable cause for which I had been summoned. At length M. de Merey came to tell me the Emperor would receive me.

His Majesty was evidently out of humor, but this circumstance had no reference either to me or to Junot. My acquaintance with his physiognomy enabled me to ascertain in a moment whether he were likely to be agreeable or the contrary. He smiled, and was going to pull my ear, but, missing it, he caught a lock of my hair, and pulled it till he almost made me cry out. In fine, he showed me all his grâces, as M. de Narbonne used to express it, and entering immediately on the subject of his message, he said to me:

"Does Junot write regularly to you?"

"Yes, Sire," answered I.

"What do you call regularly?"

"Once or twice a week—at all events, once a week."

"What does he write about?"

I looked at the Emperor without answering. My silence probably displeased him, as much as the almost imper-

I am about to allude to affect him seriously, because he thinks they are inconsistent with my friendship for him. But, on the contrary, it is a proof of friendship that I act toward him as I do."

He walked a few paces rather slowly, and then said:

"I am going to take Raincy from you."

He stopped, and darted at me one of his penetrating glances. He seemed to wish that I should inform him not only of my own thoughts, but also of what Ouvrard, Junot, Destillières, in short, everyone concerned in the affair, was likely to think. All who knew the Emperor are aware of the excessive importance he attached to the veriest trifles, in which either his own name or that of his relations had been mingled.

"Has Duroc said nothing to you?" he continued, still eyeing me with his magnetic glance.

I shook my head, and replied in a very low tone:

"No, Sire."

"Oh, oh!" said the Emperor, with a peculiar expression of countenance; "is it thus you show your attachment for Raincy? What! you pout like a child at the loss of a plaything! Well, to say the truth, I shall take it from you without regret, were it only for the sake of that fool Junot. Raincy has entailed a great expense upon him."

I made no reply, but thought of Junot. I knew how happy he was to be possessed of Raincy. He was a great sportsman, and the Forest of Bondy was contiguous to the Park of Raincy. The Emperor was not a huntsman, and the hares and deer which had superseded the robbers of the Forest of Bondy had no attractions for him. However, the tongue of envy and detraction had been busy; and I know it had been said of Junot that at Raincy he was playing the Duc d'Orléans in miniature, after having aped the Comte d'Artois at Longchamp.

"Well," continued the Emperor, "I will take Raincy off Raincy; and since I have given Neuilly to the Princess Pauline, it is necessary that I should have an estate myself near Paris. Raincy is just the thing—I will take that, and there the matter ends. Come now, Madame Junot, you know I am not in the habit of wasting my time in explaining my motives to women.”

I knew that well enough. It was nothing, in fact, but the trouble the Emperor had given himself to speak to me on the subject that impressed me with the idea of its importance. The truth was, M. Ouvrard had been busying himself in the matter, and wished once more to become possessor of Raincy. It was well known that the Emperor entertained for Ouvrard a feeling bordering on hatred. His wish, therefore, to supply Junot's place at Raincy was better explained by motives of personal pique toward Ouvrard than by the reasons which he had advanced, and which, with all respect for his excellent judgment, I could not consider valid.

“Do you know why I just now asked you what Junot wrote to you about?” said he, stopping in his eternal promenade, and sitting down, while he pointed to a chair for me.

“If your Majesty will explain your meaning to me, I shall be able to understand it—not otherwise.”

“I wish, then, to know whether he is happy and content. Do you know all that I have done for him, Madame Junot? Do you know that he is now at Lisbon as powerful as a king? He writes to inform me that the interest of the country requires that the French authority should not be counterbalanced by any other; and the last estafet I sent him conveys, along with the power he asked for, another mark of my regard for him, for certainly I should not have granted that favor to Portugal except at his urgent solicitation. It is as well that they should speech he has delivered—very much pleased. It is full of good sense and dignity.”

During all this explanation the Emperor smiled with complacency. Junot, in fact, was the child of his creation, and every meritorious action on Junot's part seemed to him but the consequence and effect of his own able instruction.

The Emperor was not the man to commence a conversation without a motive, or to prolong it because he did not know how to conclude it. For the last few moments I had been endeavoring to penetrate the motive which had induced him to send for me. Was it the affair of Raincy? Impossible! Was it to speak about Junot as he had done for the last quarter of an hour? That could never be. There must, I was convinced, be some other reason which escaped my penetration. The fact was evident; but how was I to unravel the mystery? He looked at me for a moment, and guessed what was passing in my mind; for he said to me, smiling:

“Do not trouble yourself to consider what you should do. Go! . . . The thing is clear enough.”

Extraordinary man! I reddened, and was all confusion at finding my own thoughts discovered when I was endeavoring to ascertain his.

“So, then,” continued he, with a tone that betrayed some dissatisfaction, “Junot has not told you of the good fortune which has befallen him? I did not think him so insensible to honors. He is a droll fellow.”

Then turning suddenly round—for he was sitting before a window, and beating time upon the glass with his finger to the air of “La Montferrine,” which was then a favorite in the streets of Paris—he added:

“And you, Madame Junot, who have a taste for all the fine things of this world, have you no wish to go and play find your husband there enjoying all the power and splendor you could wish. When will you write to him?"

"I think, Sire, of writing to him to-morrow, unless your Majesty commands me to do so this evening."

At first he made no reply, and appeared rather annoyed at the pointed manner in which I pronounced the word "command." He frowned, and at length said:

"Write when you please, and what you please; and perhaps the sooner the better. It is best for domestic happiness that the correspondence between husbands and wives should never be long suspended, whether they be near or far from each other."

This moral remark came so unexpectedly that I could scarcely refrain from smiling.

As the Emperor seemed to have dismissed me, I began to move toward the door, when he motioned me back with his hand, and said, as if a new idea had just struck him:

"Apropos, when you write to Junot, remind him of that aid-de-camp business about which Duroc has already spoken to him. It is an enfantillage, and for that reason I tell you to write about it. The affair is sufficiently unimportant for a woman to take part in it," added he, laughing.

"I thank your Majesty," replied I.

"Oh, you know I never like women to interfere in serious matters, because they are sure to be always intriguing!"

"Will your Majesty," said I, "permit me to deliver my opinion on that point?"

He made a sign in the affirmative.

"Women, then," said I, "seldom interfere of their own accord in serious business. Their natural indolence and love of pleasure incapacitate them from great exertions of mind; and whenever they are found mixed up in grave them with vigorous hands, for I have a favorable, nay, a high, opinion of my sex; and I am inclined to believe that the solid education we have received, for the last twenty years especially, has placed us upon a level with most, if not with all, of the other sex. But there is one thing which must always disable us from exercising paramount authority."

"Oh, you concede so much, do you? And pray what may that obstacle be?"

"The heart," replied I.

"The heart! You surely mean the head?"

"I must beg permission to differ from your Majesty. What I allude to, Sire, is the feeling which impels a woman to devote herself for the well-being of her children, of her husband, of her friend! I do not say her lover, because I imagine the devotion I have just mentioned comprehends that negation of self which a woman possesses and exercises, though love may have no place in her heart."

"And wherefore, I should wish to inquire, do you deny this feeling to men?"

I answered by shaking my head, and I made some further remarks in support of my opinions. I may mention that this was the first time I ever recollect having been honored by so long a conversation with the Emperor.

"Do you not observe, Sire," I resumed, "the reason which at times makes us appear intriguers? It is because you men dispose of us; you compel us to move like the pieces on a chessboard; you, in short, make mere machines of us."

"How?" answered he. "What say you to Madame des Ursins and Madame de Maintenon? What say you to them? Will you assert they were not intriguers? Or need I mention a hundred other similar examples?"

"I confess, Sire," replied I, "I cannot help feeling that I

The Emperor smiled again, and then abruptly said: "How old are you, Madame Junot?" I answered him by smiling in my turn, for he knew my age as well as I did myself. But he gave a wrong interpretation to my silence, and said:

"How! have you already begun to conceal your age?"

"I do not desire to conceal my age, Sire—if, indeed, it were possible, as it certainly is not, especially from your Majesty, who, I may almost say, knew me at my birth. I am twenty-two."

The Emperor took a pinch of snuff, and, counting the years on his fingers, thus proceeded:

"Yes! you are right; in 1795 you were eleven years old—right; and your mother? How old would she have now been? Ah, she never liked to tell her age! How absurd that was! What matters age to a woman so beautiful as she! She was indeed handsome. Have you her portrait?"

"We have her bust, Sire—a perfect likeness; at least, as she appeared at the time at which it was taken."

"She was," he resumed, "a singular woman! Amiable—excellent. But such a spirit! The spirit of a devil!"

As he spoke these words, he alternately took snuff and tapped his fingers on the arm of his chair; while I, with the door in my hand (which I had been holding for a full quarter of an hour), was waiting only to be dismissed. At the mention of my mother's name, however, I began to turn the handle, in order to make my way out at the first offensive word he might utter. This he perceived, and immediately said:

"Did she often speak to you of me?"

"Never, Sire," I replied.

"Impossible!" cried he, rising from his chair, with an air of displeasure—"Impossible!"

your Majesty decreed the exile of your brother."

It is impossible to describe the emotion I excited in him by this seemingly innocent remark. He rose, endeavored to speak, and then sat down again. The color flew to his cheek, and as quickly deserted it. He rose a second time, pushed his chair from him with violence, and fixing on me a look, which, to say the least, was stern, seemed struggling to restrain his passion. At length, suddenly assuming the most gracious tone and manner, he said:

"Well, good evening; and when you write to Junot, give my remembrances to him."

I courtesied and left him, after a conversation which had lasted more than three-quarters of an hour. But I had no sooner reached the end of the gallery than the door of the cabinet opened, and the Emperor, in a loud voice, called after me, "Madame Junot!"

I turned, and perceived him at the door, beckoning me to return. I did so.

"Did you not tell me," said he, as soon as I approached him, "that you were in attendance on Signora Lætitia?"

"Yes, Sire," I answered; "and I am now going to her."

"Tell her, then, that I wish she would come and breakfast with me to-morrow."

The Emperor again bade me farewell with a gracious motion of his hand, and retired into his closet.

I found Madame impatiently expecting me. That excellent Princess evinced for me the utmost kindness and benevolence. I related to her the conversation I had had with the Emperor, and she seemed not at all displeased, for, to say the truth, the loss of Raincy was, in her opinion, rather a benefit than an evil. She appeared pleased to hear how angry I had made him by my remarks respecting Lucien. But when I delivered the message the Emperor had sent to her, she seemed vexed. I pretended not to observe this, and it was not till some time afterward that I learned the reason of her displeasure

CHAPTER VI.

The Emperor's Family—Negotiations between Napoleon and Lucien—M. Campi—His Mission to Canino—Madame Lucien Bonaparte—The Duchy of Parma and the Throne of Naples—Lucien's Magnanimous Conduct—His Daughter Charlotte—Her Projected Marriage with Ferdinand VII.—Her Departure for Spain Countermanded—Affairs of Spain—M. de Talleyrand.

THE interior of the Emperor's family presented a curious picture. There were circumstances connected with it which, though concealed from the world, had a strong influence on important public questions, as well as upon private interests. This was the case, for instance, on the occasion of the long negotiations which passed between the Emperor and his brother Lucien from the year 1807 to 1809. About this time the Emperor wished to establish a universal monarchy through the medium of the members of his family; and notwithstanding the scene which had occurred at Mantua, a new chance seemed now to offer itself of a reconciliation between the two brothers.

The pretext for opening this new negotiation was the demand made by the Prince of the Asturias to Napoleon for espousing a daughter of the Bonaparte family. The Emperor was perfectly convinced that Lucien would not be inclined to give, or rather to sacrifice, his daughter, by consenting to her marriage with a man who had acted a most unnatural part toward his father and mother. He therefore saw the necessity of managing the business skillfully, and he accordingly engaged M. Campi to be the bearer of the propositions to Canino, where Lucien then resided. M. Campi was a devoted friend of the Emperor, of Charlotte Bonaparte with the Prince of the Asturias. In this affair the Emperor behaved with a degree of duplicity which cannot be excused. It is evident that at that very moment he was revolving in his mind a plan with regard to Ferdinand which seemed utterly at variance with his communication to Lucien. M. Campi was the bearer of a letter, inviting Lucien, on the part of the Emperor, to repair to Paris in order to hear and discuss personally a new proposition which would be made to him: this was that Lucien should accept the Kingdom of Naples.

Joseph was to have another sovereignty, though its name was not specified; but Holland being the only one to give away, as Louis intended soon to renounce his throne, it might be presumed that the exchange was to be between Naples and the Hague. However, it was not so; for the throne of Spain was the point to which the Emperor's views were directed. He wished at the same time to have Italy at his disposal; and Lucien, whose courage, both moral and physical, he well knew, was the man suited to his purpose. On this occasion Napoleon proved how a determination once formed in his mind became stronger instead of weaker in time. He had said once in the Council of State: "I never will acknowledge the wife of my brother Lucien to be my sister-in-law."

These words having been emphatically uttered in the sanctuary of the laws, he regarded them as a solemn bond. But this was, in fact, only another proof of that despotic power which the Emperor was always eager to exercise whenever any member of his family attempted to become a free agent. In proportion as Lucien's conduct was noble and honorable in asserting his political independence, the more was the Emperor resolved to force him to give up another point, which he could not relinquish without a sacrifice of honor. Napoleon entertained for Madame Lucien a feeling closely bordering on hatred.

mothers and wives of the celebrated Romans to have been. She lived in a style of magnificence which accorded with her husband's station; but seldom stirred from her home, where she was surrounded by a numerous family, which formed a sufficient defense against the tongue of slander. Her conduct was irreproachable, and she rendered Lucien completely happy.

Like him, she possessed a taste for literature, and her society served to alleviate the chagrin and irritation which occasionally resulted from the Emperor's treatment of his brother. Indeed, if it were true, as the Emperor used to say, that Lucien had contracted this union only to vex him, he at all events found in it a source of happiness which possibly might not have resulted from a marriage concluded under more favorable auspices.

Napoleon instructed M. Campi to convey to his brother the investiture of the Duchy of Parma; but it was not for Lucien, but for his wife ALONE. As to Lucien, he was to be King of Naples. Madame Lucien was to proceed from Rome to Parma in quality of Duchess, taking with her two of her children; that is to say, two of her daughters, for she was not to take either of her sons. When once beyond the walls of Rome, it was Napoleon's wish that she should be separated from Lucien as completely and finally as death could have separated her. On condition of her making this sacrifice, the Emperor was willing to acknowledge her as his sister-in-law, and to behave toward her as a kind relation. But she was to break every tie which attached her to life, and to be separated from all she held dear!

On receiving Campi's communication Lucien instantly refused, not merely the crown of Naples, with permission to be a free agent, but also the Duchy of Parma, which he conceived he could purchase only by base and dishonorable

"Where is the letter?" said Lucien with apparent composure. Madame Lucien gave it to him. He immediately tore it to pieces, and threw it on the ground. Madame Lucien insisted on conciliating the Emperor, and securing the advantage of her husband and children at any personal sacrifice to herself. But Lucien was firmly fixed in his resolution, and it was finally agreed that the Emperor's offers should be rejected. The carriage designed to convey Madame Lucien to Parma was in attendance; everything had been prepared for the journey; but all was instantly countermanded.

As to the proposed marriage of Lucien's daughter with the Prince of the Asturias, the refusal was not so immediate. On the contrary, Lucien directed preparations to be made for her departure to Spain. His daughter Charlotte was a beautiful and accomplished girl of fourteen or fifteen years of age.* Indeed, she would have formed a most desirable match for any prince in the world, and Ferdinand might have been most happy in possessing her.

The preparations for her departure were carried on with so much secrecy that the good people of Rome knew nothing of the matter, and probably I am now the first to give publicity to the affair. Madame Letiers, the wife of the Director of the French Academy, was selected to accompany the young Princess to Spain. Everything was ready, when one morning Lucien sent to request that Comte de Chatillon would come and speak to him. The Count, who was an intimate friend of Lucien Bonaparte, had been reduced by the events of the Revolution to the necessity of exercising professionally his talent in the fine arts. This gentleman had followed Lucien in his banishment to Italy. He resided in his house at Canino, and assisted in the education of his children.

Lucien, on sending for the Count, unexpectedly directed possesses not the power. Therefore it is better that my poor child should be under the protection of her father." The Princess Charlotte accordingly remained at home.

Such is the history of the first negotiation for the marriage of Prince Ferdinand with a relative of Napoleon—a marriage which the former had solicited. M. Campi returned to France in order to report the result of his mission to Napoleon, and this affair contributed not a little to heighten the feeling of animosity which the Emperor entertained toward Madame Lucien.

A great deal has been said relative to Napoleon's project of giving to the surviving members of the Bourbon family a crown in Europe. It would be perhaps a difficult question to decide whether this project was the result of a sudden or a deliberate determination on his part. Be this as it may, I can assert, without the fear of contradiction, that the designs which the Emperor entertained with regard to Spain did not originate long before the time when Ferdinand wrote him the letter from the Escorial. At that period the weakness exhibited by the Court of Madrid led him to believe that it would be more favorable to the interests of Spain that he should give her a Sovereign than that she should be governed by an unprincipled favorite, a profligate Queen, and an imbecile King.

It has been alleged that M. de Talleyrand powerfully influenced the Emperor in the part he took after the affairs of Aranjuez. I do not deny that such may be the fact; but I must remark that Napoleon was not the man to allow himself to be greatly INFLUENCED by anyone. I know, for instance, that M. de Talleyrand advised him to go to Spain to consummate the work which had been begun by that good and trusty Castilian, Izquierdo; but I am inclined to believe that M. de Talleyrand, with all his finesse, was in this matter rather the instrument than the director, and that, in this Spanish business, Napoleon out-

The Grand-Duchess of Berg's Masquerade—A Quadrille of Sixteen Ladies—The Tyrolean Peasant Girls—Prince Camille Borghèse—His Extraordinary Disguise—The Blue Mask—Isabey Personating the Emperor—His Large Hands—The Dance Interrupted—Mademoiselle Gu——t and the Grand-Duchess—The New Nobility—The Duc de Rovigo—General Rapp—The Salute—The Duchesse de Montebello—The Pope's Bull and the Ass Laden with Relics.

ONE of the most remarkable entertainments in Paris was a masquerade given by the Grand-Duchess of Berg. In the course of the evening a quadrille was danced; this was really the first one which deserved the name; for those introduced at the marriage of the Princess of Baden had none of the characteristics of a quadrille, except that of being danced by four couples, dressed in red, green, and blue.

The costume which the Grand-Duchess of Berg selected was that of the Tyrolese peasantry, and her Highness had arranged that the quadrille should be exclusively danced by females. We made a party of sixteen Tyrolean peasant girls, and we were headed by our bailli. This venerable personage was represented by Mademoiselle Adelaide de Lagrange. The Grand-Duchess, for some reason or other, did not wish the quadrille dancers to assemble at her residence in the Elysée Napoleon. She requested that they might meet at my house, and proceed altogether to the Elysée. Her Highness gave orders to this effect to Despreaux, the director of the Court ballets. About nine o'clock I had a rehearsal of the quadrille in the grand gallery of my Hôtel. Several of my friends who were not included in the Grand-Duchess's invitation Vauguyon, and her sister, the Princesse de Beauffremont. Then there was the Baronne de Montmorency, and some others whose names I forget. I believe the Duchesse de Rovigo was one of them. We were engaged in adjusting our masks, when M. Cavagnari* entered and whispered me that a lady who was included in the quadrille was waiting in the next room; but as she had come too late she wished me to go and conduct her in.

I cast my eyes over the list sent me by the Grand-Duchess. I found my number was complete; but as the Princesse de Ponte-Corvo, one of the masks, was not in my list, I concluded that she must be the lady who had just arrived. I therefore proceeded to the salon, which formed a sort of anteroom to the gallery. There I perceived, in the further corner of the apartment, a lady, whose short and bulky person was so ludicrous that at first I could not help starting back with astonishment. Imagine a figure about five feet some inches in height, but incredibly stout, and dressed in the Tyrolean costume. I approached this singular apparition; as I advanced, I became more and more amazed at the grotesque figure before me. "Mon Dieu! what an extraordinary person!" thought I to myself. "To whom have I the honor to address myself?" inquired I.

The mask answered only by a deep sigh. I now found it impossible to contain my laughter. A second sigh succeeded, much more profound than the first, and it was breathed with such force as to blow up the lace trimming of the mask. Being anxious to terminate this embarrassing sort of conversation, I extended my hand to the lady, and proposed to conduct her to the gallery; when she suddenly seized me by the waist, and, raising her mask, attempted to kiss me. I screamed, and, disengaging myself, flew to the bell, and pulled it with all my might. Truly, my precipitation might well be excused, for I felt a rough beard in amused by the extraordinary travestie. It would be difficult to convey an idea of the burlesque figure he presented, especially when, having removed his mask, he exhibited his bluish beard, black whiskers, and bushy hair, some stubborn locks of which escaped from beneath the Indian muslin veil. The whimsical effect of all this was heightened by the contrast of the young and elegant females who were grouped around him, and whose costume he had closely imitated. It was alternately amusing and provoking to find our Sosio reflecting us so admirably in caricature.

It was now time to proceed to the Palace, and it was agreed that the Prince should go with us. We found the Grand-Duchess of Berg waiting to receive us in her private apartment, attended by the Princesse de Ponte-Corvo, both dressed exactly in the same style as ourselves. Great merriment was excited by the introduction of our newly-recruited Tyrolese peasant girl. We entered the ball-room headed by our venerable bailli, holding in her hand her little white staff, and wearing her wig most magisterially. As we were proceeding from the inner apartment to the gallery, a little mask in blue ran against me on his way to the closet, where the dominoes were changed. I was pushed aside with so much force that I almost felt inclined to be angry. But the little blue mask was no other than the Emperor!

Napoleon liked to divert himself, as he used to say, in these saturnalia. He loved to disguise himself completely, and allow some individual to assume his character. On the evening in question Isabey was to personate him. The humor of that celebrated artist was admirably calculated to enliven a masked ball, while the Emperor made but a poor figure in such an entertainment. In personating Napoleon, Isabey found it most difficult to disguise his hands, which were exceedingly large, while the Emperor's were small and beautifully formed. With the exception, how-strains of the orchestra and the gay buzz of conversation were interrupted by the tones of a loud female voice which exclaimed in an imperious tone: "I desire that you shall instantly quit my house!" This was the voice of the Grand-Duchess herself.

Those who were connected with the Imperial Court at the time will recollect that a very pretty girl, Mademoiselle Gu——t had been in the service of the Empress before the appointment of Madame C——. Mademoiselle Gu——t was a most beautiful creature, like Queen Hortense, who to every other proof of goodness joined that of loving to see agreeable faces about her. She had been very kind to Mademoiselle Gu——t. She took the young lady to the Grand-Duchess's ball, where she might be one of the characters in a quadrille. Whether the Grand-Duchess was really ignorant of the presence of Mademoiselle Gu——t until the moment of the explosion above cited, or whether she maliciously wished to put the young lady in a painful situation, I pretend not to decide; but certain it is that she seemed to evince astonishment at learning that Mademoiselle Gu——t was in the room, and instantly gave vent to her indignation in the words I have recorded.

Poor Mademoiselle Gu——t, in tears, declared that the conduct of the Grand-Duchess was most unjust and cruel, and could not be excused, even by the jealousy of an offended wife. The truth is, it was the love of the Grand-Duchess for the Grand-Duke which had given rise to the angry scene. Mademoiselle Gu——t had attracted the notice of his Highness, and that was sin enough to thus visited by a public censure.

Queen Hortense, however, warmly espoused the cause of the young lady, and with some success. But it can easily be conceived that the whole scene had a very

However, it is but just to all parties to mention that very shortly after the Empress's arrival at Bayonne it was found necessary to furnish Mademoiselle Gu——t with a passport to return to Paris to her mother.

I have not yet spoken of a most important circumstance in the political life of the Emperor, viz, the creation of his new Nobility. The institution of the Order of the Legion of Honor had already paved the way for this, but the work was not consummated until the creation of hereditary titles, with endowments. It was indeed expected that the Emperor would earlier have directed his attention to this matter, for the creation of the Duchy of Dantzic on the 28th of May, 1807, sufficiently revealed his intention.

I was on duty with Madame at the Tuileries, and used to accompany her to the family dinners which took place every Sunday. On one of these occasions, while I was waiting in the salon de service in the Pavilion of Flora, I perceived Savary approaching me. "Embrace me!" cried he; "I have good news." "Tell me the news first," said I, "and then I shall see whether it be worth the reward." "Well, then, I am a Duke." "That is news indeed," said I; "but why should I embrace you for that?" "My title is the Duke of Rovigo," continued he, marching up and down the room in an ecstasy of joy. "And what do I care for your ridiculous title?" said I in a tone of impatience.

"Had he told you that you are a Duchess," said Rapp, stepping up to me and taking both my hands in his, "I am sure you would have embraced him, as you will embrace me for bringing you the intelligence." "That I will," said I, presenting my cheek to my old friend Rapp, whose frank and cordial manner quite delighted me. "And another for Junot," said he, smiling. "Well, be it so," answered I, "and I promise you I will

We descended to the salon at the foot of the staircase of the Pavilion of Flora for dinner. At the head of the table usually sat the Empress's Lady of Honor (the Comtesse de la Rochefoucauld) or the Dame d'honneur. Sometimes, in the absence of both these ladies, the Empress, in waiting at the Palace would preside. On the occasions I allude to, Madame de la Rochefoucauld was at head—an honor, by the bye, which she seldom conferred on us. I found myself quite solitary in the midst of the company. The party was composed of individuals whose manners and conversation did not suit my taste.

Thus I was very glad when I saw Madame enter the salon. Her company was always welcome to me, but now it was especially so. We immediately drew near each other, and sat down together at the table. "How do you do," said I, "here are great changes, but I am sure they will not work none in you." I was right. She might subsequently have conceived a taste for these pomps and vanities, but at that time she was a simple, kind, and perfectly natural creature. "You may, indeed, be sure that they will do but little for them," replied Madame Lannes; "and I am sure Lannes will not feel himself elevated by them. He will know his turn of mind; he is still unchanged; but there are many who surround the Emperor who entertain diametrically opposite opinions. Look around you."

I looked up, and beheld opposite to me the Duke of Rovigo, whose countenance was radiant with complacency. The Duchesse de Rovigo sat at some distance from us. "I'll wager," said I to Madame Lannes, "that she is not so vain of her elevation. She is a sensible woman, and not likely to assume any of these pompous airs." Madame Lannes smiled.

"And what title have you got?" said I, after a further conversation. "Oh, a charming one!" replied Madame Lannes. "Duchesse de Montebello! Mine and yours are the

Our Sunday evenings at the Tuileries were not like others; for on that day we were not permitted to enter the Emperor's salon to wait for the Princess. Sometimes, when the Emperor was in a good humor, he would invite the Dames de Palais, or other ladies who accompanied Madame, to enter. It happened so on the day I here allude to.

"Well, Madame la Duchesse Gouverneuse," said the Emperor to me as soon as I entered, "are you satisfied with your title of Abrantès? Junot, too, ought to be pleased with it, for I intend it as a proof of my satisfaction with his conduct.* And what do they say of it in your salons of the Faubourg Saint Germain? They must be a little mortified at the reinforcement I have sent them."

Then, turning to the Arch-Chancellor, he said: "Well, Monsieur, after all, nothing that I have done is more in unison with the true spirit of the French Revolution than the re-establishment of high dignities. The French people fought for only one thing: equality in the eye of the law, and the power of controlling the acts of their Government. Now, my Nobility, as they style it, is in reality no nobility at all, because it is without prerogatives or hereditary succession. The only prerogative it enjoys, if prerogative it can be called, is the fortune conferred by way of recompense for civil or military services; while its hereditary succession depends on the will of the Sovereign in confirming the title on the son or nephew of the deceased holder. My Nobility is, after all, one of my finest creations."

About this time a curious circumstance happened to me, which affords an example of the accuracy with which the Emperor gained information of everybody's affairs and actions. I always entertained a sort of religious ven-

La Croix, who had educated my sister, Madame Geouffre, and to the Abbé Remy, who had been her confessor. The Abbé, whom I have not seen more than five or six times in the course of my life, was an honest man, but perfectly null with respect to talent, and certainly quite incapable of being the leader of a conspiracy.

When the Abbé Remy came to Paris he brought me a letter of introduction from my brother Albert, from which I learned that the good priest, who had been formerly my sister's tutor, had escaped the massacres of September. I received him as I would receive an old friend, and, had Junot been in Paris, I am sure I could have convinced him that it would have been wrong to do otherwise. But Junot was then in Lisbon; and I did not write to him on the subject, conceiving it to be quite unimportant. What was my surprise when Duroc, who was always sent on missions of this sort, called one day to inform me that I had received in my house a factious priest, who had brought to France copies of the Commminatory Bull addressed to the Emperor by Pope Pius VII.!

I stared at Duroc as though he had been addressing me in Greek. A Bull of Excommunication appeared to me a thing so perfectly fabulous, that I never dreamed it could have existence in the year 1808. It was no less extraordinary that I should be accused of having any knowledge of it. I said this to Duroc, and he pressed the matter no further. He informed me of what I was very sorry to hear, viz, that the Abbé Remy, like the ass laden with relics (I ask his pardon for the comparison), had actually brought, in a letter of six or seven envelopes, the famous Commminatory Bull.

The Emperor was in a rage. "I had seen this man, I had known him long. How happened it that I was always—always—in league with his enemies?" I was angry with Duroc for being the bearer of such an absurd charge.

faults; he was not more gifted with patience than I was. He spoke to me sharply; I replied to him still more sharply. He rose and took his departure, and the result of this fine scene was that I burst into a flood of tears. M. de Narbonne, who called on me almost every day, happened at this moment to enter.

On learning the cause of my distress, he told me that he had a week before heard the whole history of the Bull. He very well knew, he said, the man who had brought this document into France—a document which, he observed, was very stupidly drawn up, and was likely to make the Pope lose St. Peter's chair; and that if the Abbé Remy had brought a copy of the Bull, it was only a duplicate.

I confess I did not very well understand the matter, even after this explanation. A Bull of Excommunication was to me a sort of miracle. The learned word COMMUNICATORY, which M. de Narbonne was also obliged to explain, appeared to me more calculated than all the rest to rouse the Emperor's anger. "But what," said I to M. de Narbonne, "is the cause of this sudden misunderstanding between his Majesty and his Holiness?" The circumstances attending the removal of the Pope were but little known then in Paris,* and yet what a noise that event and the Excommunication of Napoleon were making in other parts of the world!

One day while we were in Spain (at Ledesma) and I was sitting at my window admiring the enchanting beauty of the surrounding landscape, Junot suddenly entered the apartment. He was gloomy and disturbed. I read in his countenance that some serious event had occurred. "What is the matter?" inquired I eagerly. "Look," said Junot, throwing into my lap a paper printed in the Spanish language; "read that."

municated. I mention this fact in conjunction with the Comminatory Bull. I have not yet come to the Spanish war. I merely wish to point attention to the imposition which was attached to the Pope's Bull, even in the defamed valleys of Castille and Estremadura. The following is a fragment of this curious document:

"For some time past the Holy See has been obliged to support an enormous burden of your troops. Since 1807 they have cost me five millions of piasters.* You have taken from Us the Duchies of Benevento and Ponte-Corvo! and you have constituted Us a Kingdom in Our Apostolic residence. We appeal to all nations, and, above all, we appeal to you yourself, as to a SON CONSECRATED and VOWED, to redress the injury to, and maintain the rights of, the Catholic Church."

Napoleon replied to this by immediately taking possession of the provinces of Ancona, Macerata, Urbino, and Camerino, and annexing them to the kingdom of Italy. The Pope's Legate quitted Paris. M. de Champagny was then Minister for Foreign Affairs, but who, like the rest of Napoleon's Ministers, was only a kind of court clerk, published a sort of apology for the conduct of France.

The Pope replied through Cardinal Gabrielli, his Secretary of State (and uncle to Prince Gabrielli, who afterwards married Lucien's daughter). The answer of his Holiness was couched in those terms of peace and conciliation which became the Chief of the Christian Church—the Vicar of Christ. But if ever circumstances can justify the exercise of the Pontiff for entering upon a war, Pius VII. may reasonably claim that justification.

* About one million sterling.

CHAPTER VIII.

Letters from Junot and Duroc—Junot Proposes to Resign All His Appointments—My Visit to Princess Caroline—The Emperor's Kindness to Junot—He Promises to Write to Him Himself—An Old Recollection Revived—The Audience Prolonged till Half-past Eleven at Night—My Conversation with the Grand-Duchess of Berg—Duroc's Letter to Junot.

ONE morning when my femme de chambre entered my apartment to call me up, she told me with a joyous air that news had arrived from Lisbon, and she laid on my bed a packet which she said had been brought by M. Prevost, Junot's aid-de-camp.

I immediately opened the packet. It contained two letters, one from Junot, which was as follows:

"As soon as you receive this letter, my dear Laura, make every preparation for leaving Paris, so that on my arrival nothing may retard us. I know how great will be your astonishment; and I will explain myself.

"I received by the last estafette a letter from Duroc. He wrote, on the part of the Emperor, informing me that I must choose between the post of first aid-de-camp and that of Governor of Paris, because the two appointments were incompatible one with another. His Majesty cannot suppose that I would hesitate for a single instant in the choice he offers to me. To live for him, and for him only, has long been the dearest wish of my heart. When I again appear before him, he shall find me just what I was in the glorious days of the Army of Italy. Let him lavish his favors on the men who surround him—all of whom are eager for favors and honors. For my part, I relinquish them. Let the Emperor press my hand at parting, or, rather, let him say that I am never again to quit him, and I shall be happier than I have been with all the splendor with which he has loaded me. . . . Besides, I am at present ill in health. My old disorder is returning, and the wound I received in Egypt is threatening to open again. I shall demand a definite congé,

"Adieu, my dear Laura. I know that this letter will render you uneasy; but I cannot refrain from making you the confidant of all my troubles. You know that, next to you, the Emperor has, of all persons in the world, the most power to make me either miserable or happy! . . . It is because you know my heart that I thus unfold it to you. . . . Adieu, my beloved Laura . . . embrace our children—above all, our son. In the retirement in which I shall henceforth live, I must owe to you the only happiness to which I shall henceforth aspire."

"THE DUKE D'ABRANTÈS."

The following is a copy of Duroc's letter, the original of which is in my possession:

"MY DEAR JUNOT:—I am directed by his Majesty to acquaint you that he considers the two posts of aid-de-camp and Governor of Paris incompatible the one with the other. I presume your choice cannot be doubtful, one of the appointments being merely an empty honor. However, it is not for me to tell you what you ought to do. But I recommend you to reflect maturely before you write your answer; and, above all, look upon the communication which I now make to you on the part of the Emperor AS A PROOF OF HIS ATTACHMENT TO YOU. These are his own words. As to me, my dear Junot, you can never doubt my regard for you; and I hope you do me the justice to place me foremost in the list of your best friends.

"Adieu, my dear General. Rely on my friendship.

"DUROC.

"Paris, February 10th."

For a few moments after the perusal of these letters, I was plunged into a sort of stupor. At length, when I had somewhat recovered from my bewilderment, I began to feel uneasy about the impression which might be produced on the Emperor by Junot's intended letter. He might possibly accept the proffered resignation; and if Junot should seriously have thought of retiring to Montbard, I confess I had not sufficient philosophy for that. I was aware that it was necessary to act in this juncture with caution and promptitude. I looked at my watch; it was a quarter past ten. A thought suddenly came across my

About half-past ten I entered the courtyard of the palace, where I saw a plain carriage with the Emperor's livery.

"Can it be he?" thought I to myself; and, without entering the salon de service, I inquired whether I could for one moment see Madame Dupont, the Princess Caroline's principal femme de chambre. I was right in my conjecture. The Emperor was with his sister. For me this was a most fortunate accident; but how was I to disturb the fraternal tête-à-tête?

"They are walking together in the garden," said Madame Dupont; "but if you will write a few words to her Highness, I will go and deliver them."

Madame Dupont gave me pen, ink, and paper, and I wrote to the Princess Caroline that I begged the favor of a few minutes' conversation with her on a subject of the utmost importance to me. The billet was immediately carried to the Princess.

"Oh, oh!" said the Emperor; "you receive letters sometimes! What is that?"

Without further ceremony, he took the note out of his sister's hand, and read it at a single glance, for it contained but three lines.

"Diable!" he exclaimed; "is Madame Junot up already? Well, I will leave you to chat together, and I will go back to the Tuileries to breakfast. Adieu, Madame Caroline!"

He embraced his sister, and took leave of her very good-humoredly, for I could see him perfectly well from the little apartment in which I was waiting.

The Princess sent immediately to request that I would come to her. She received me with the kindness of an old and cordial friend.

"Mon Dieu!" she said, taking me by the hand; "what is the matter? How pale you are! Has any misfortune

At that moment a valet de chambre stepped up to the Princess, and delivered to her a large packet, the back of which I recognized Junot's handwriting. Most probably he had not come to the Elysée until after he left the Tuileries, and finding that the Emperor was at the Elysée, he thought it best not to deliver the packet until the Princess was alone. Junot's letter to the Princess was almost the same as that which he had written to me.

"What had I best do?" said I.

"It is evident," replied the Princess, "that the Emperor is not out of humor. He was joking and laughing during the whole of his visit to me, which was a tolerably good one. If he had been offended by Junot's letter, I should have discovered it in his manner. Besides, he would have mentioned it to me; and he said not a word about it."

"But what shall I do?" I again repeated.

"Ask the Emperor for an audience."

"I should wish to do so. But do you think he will grant it?"

"That will be the touchstone," observed the Princess. "If he grant the audience, it is clear he is not offended. If he refuse it——"

"Do you think it likely he will refuse it?" inquired the Princess, pressing her pretty little hands in mine.

"No," replied she, "I do not think so; and even if he should, rely on my friendship—rely on that of Madame Junot. But how hasty Junot is!"

When I left the Princess, I was somewhat more at ease, though I had no particular reason to be so. I returned home, and immediately wrote to the Chamberlain on duty, soliciting an audience of his Majesty. At seven o'clock I received a letter from the Chamberlain, announcing that the Emperor would receive me that same evening at nine.

attachment to the General rendered him observant—that Junot appeared much depressed in spirits.

I spent the remainder of the day in reflecting on the interview of the evening. It was evident that the Emperor knew why I had solicited the audience, and that he did not disapprove my motives. But what would he say to me? Perhaps he would approve of Junot's retirement without withdrawing from him his friendship. "Princes are as chary of their favors as they are of their friendship," thought I, as my carriage rolled rapidly toward the Tuileries. "If—but no; that is impossible."

As the palace clock struck three-quarters past eight, I alighted; for I knew the Emperor to be extremely punctual in all his appointments—at least, when they did not happen to interfere with a review or with the Council of State.

This interview with Napoleon formed a memorable epoch in my life. It had an important effect on the subsequent life of Junot, which was henceforth deprived of the radiant prism which had before illumined it. His happiness was separated from that of the man who disposed of our destinies as a magician rules those of the beings subject to the power of his wand.

On arriving in the salon de service, where the aids-de-camp and civil officers of the Emperor's Household were assembled, I asked the first person I saw whether the Emperor was alone. I was informed that he was. I was so agitated that I cannot (and, indeed, I could not the very next day) recollect who were the individuals in the salon de service, with the exception of one only. I seated myself in the great red armchair which stood beside the fireplace, and there I remained absorbed in a profound reverie until I heard someone address me by name in a low tone of voice. I looked up, and saw Duroc standing before me.

"Do you think," said I, "that I have anything to fear?"

"Nothing whatever," replied he. "The Emperor said not a word to me of the letter which he had received from Junot; but I fear from the style of the letter which your husband has written to me that that he has sent to the Emperor is calculated to disconcert him. Do not be alarmed in anticipation, and, above all, be perfectly mistress of yourself. You are aware that that probably depends the success of your conference. Do you think it possible that Junot has really tendered the resignation of all his appointments?"

"I have not the least doubt of it."

"How imprudent!—how precipitate!"

Duroc paced up and down thoughtfully. Excuse me, friend! He regretted the imprudence of his brother-in-arms, of whose glory and good fortune he was so envious; for envy was not in his nature. He was fearful that Junot had done what might prove fatal to his interests. With what solicitude I watched his movements, he could easily be imagined; for Duroc was, to all who knew him, confidence reposed in him, a sort of mirror, in which the Emperor was in part reflected. At that moment the clock struck half-past nine.

"Do you know whether the Emperor is informed of our presence here?" said Duroc to me in a whisper.

I answered in the affirmative. The Emperor's bell rang, and I was immediately introduced.

Though this was perhaps the twentieth time that I had had a private interview with the Emperor, yet I had never felt so agitated on any former occasion. My limbs trembled under me, my sight failed me, and I had almost lost myself in self-possession. I felt that the fate of Junot and of his children depended almost on a hair.

The Emperor was standing before his desk. When

"No, no. I wish to see how you can make amends for an offense."

"How, Sire? Surely your Majesty does not think of punishing the offender in this case? He has been much injured."

"And by whom, pray?"

"By your Majesty."

"By me! How so?"

"Do you think, Sire, that it is no injury to wound a man so profoundly devoted to you, which has no wish, no ambition, but to love and to serve you? This is an injury, and a great injury."

"Hem! All this is mere words!"

He paced up and down for a few moments, during which his countenance assumed a serious expression, but without any trace of severity. He sat down in his armchair, gave a sign to me to take a seat, and then said in a tone of unusual gravity:

"Madame Junot, observe well what I am going to say to you, for I wish you to write it to Junot. Mark my words, for I am not in the habit of speaking idly. I have told Junot, through the medium of Duroc, inform him that he must choose between the post of my first aid-de-camp and that of Governor of Paris. As to the post attached to this last appointment extensive military prerogatives, I do not wish that ANY ONE OF MY SUBJECTS should take advantage of the example set during the Revolution and confer the two appointments on one individual. Do you understand me?"

"Perfectly, Sire."

"I for some time entertained the design of creating the post of my first aid-de-camp with great privileges and great advantages; but I found impediments in the way. I promised this post to Junot after the Battle of Austerlitz. He reminds me of this in his letter, and he is right. Promises made on a field of battle ought to be kept."

hobby, if I may be allowed the expression, was to love for himself alone. Junot had given him so many proofs of that sort of attachment that he could enter no doubt on the subject; but possibly he liked to receive new assurances of it, for after the above question he turned the chair which was near him, and, leaning on the back of it, looked at me steadfastly.

"Yes," he added, "I know he is much attached to you—I almost think he loves me better than you."

"Better than me! No, Sire; but certainly better than any mistress."

"How! you certainly are not jealous of me?"

I looked at him significantly; I ventured to revive an old recollection, and uttered the word "Toulon." I perceived an expression of satisfaction in his countenance.

"Oh! so he lets you so far into his confidence? He told you the history of his adventures when he and I were comrades together? Well, let him speak for himself; but he must not tell tales of me."

All this was said in a tone of pleasantry which made me not in the least fearful of having gone too far. The recollection which I had revived had reference to the following little incident:

When at Toulon, Junot fell in love—so deeply in love that he used to go out at night and sigh and sing under his mistress's window. Napoleon happened to see the subject of his attachment, and fell in love with her too. It was enough for Junot, and he immediately relinquished his suit. He never acquainted his friend with this sacrifice, which, however, was not made without a considerable struggle. I knew this little adventure, and as the Emperor's memory was always susceptible of being roused by the slightest hint, I was sure of being understood. However, he did not pursue the subject: but, fixing upon with his two hands crossed behind his back. I am ignorant, for to HIM, at least, Junot had not acted like a traitor, when in '94 and '95 he made him the share of his mother's savings.

"Sire," said I, with some degree of impatience, "Your Majesty's memory is not faithful; and permit me to observe that your heart especially ought to remind you, to you, at least, Junot always acted the part of a brother. Be pleased to recollect Marseilles. My father never forgotten it."

I know not what inspired me with this boldness, at that moment I felt that I could have said more. The Emperor darted at me a look by which my words would have been confounded. Then, shrugging his shoulders, he said:

"But even admitting that Junot loves me well, I can affirm that he does not love me better than the love of his ambition. And to that he would sacrifice anything, even you."

"Allow me to assure your Majesty that you do not know Junot's character—that you calumniate his heart. He loves you, Sire, better than all the honors you can heap upon him—better than your crown, perhaps, than he loves me (though vanity made me the contrary just now); better, perhaps, than his children!"

Penetrated with the sincerity of this sentiment which pervaded Junot's whole existence, and which I had never been duly appreciated, I burst into tears.

Napoleon stepped up to me, took me by the hand, pinching the ends of my fingers, a favor which he had never before conferred on me, he said:

"Come, come, dry up your tears. This is the weakness of you women, you always resort to tears. This with tears, and I would have given anything for permission to withdraw. At that moment the clock struck eleven. Napoleon seemed to be roused from his reverie. He stood still and repeated the lines:

“Il vento sbuffa, La pioggia precipitasi.”

“What terrible weather this is!” he added; “it is well we are not bivouacking. Poor Junot must have suffered greatly on his marches in Portugal. I understand that the rains there inundate the roads in a single night. Is that true?”

This question led to a multitude of inquiries respecting the climate of Portugal, the character of the inhabitants, the Marquis d’Alora, M. d’Araujo, and the Pope’s Nuncio, who, after having very servilely paid his court to the French, and especially to the Duc d’Abrantès, had just then quitted Lisbon as a fugitive. After obtaining all the information he could draw from me respecting the affairs of the Peninsula, he smiled, and said, with a most prepossessing grace:

“Good evening, Madame Junot; I will not say good night, for I am sure you will write to Junot before you retire to bed. Am I not right?”

“Most certainly, Sire,” I replied, quite charmed with his kind and gracious manner. “To-morrow’s estafette shall convey to Junot an accurate account of all the kindness your Majesty has evinced for him to-night. It will make him very happy. But, Sire, your Majesty has promised me a treasure of consolation for your most faithful servant. Certainly he has been wrong in so inconsiderately taking the alarm at Duroc’s letter; but he has suffered for it, Sire, and he has suffered long. When my letter shall reach Lisbon, it will be six weeks since Junot received Duroc’s. I am sure that a line from your Majesty, that

"Be particular in explaining my reasons for what I have done. Tell him that I never entertained the thought of intrusting the government of Paris to anyone but himself. Hulin is a worthy man, and is very competent for what he has to do, but nothing more. Junot is a young man of talent, but he is too hot-headed. Adieu, Madame Junot. I will tell him that he has an excellent chargé d'affaires here. Good evening. Apropos, how is my little godson? You have but that one boy, I believe?"

I courtesied.

"But that will not do. You must have many more. I wish to see my throne surrounded by the sons of my friends, and Junot is one of those friends whom I most love and esteem. Tell him this."

As I left the Emperor's closet all who were in waiting outside eyed me with some degree of curiosity. A whole hour and a half's conversation with Napoleon! and at that time too! What could I have had to say to him? What could he have had to say to me? All these questions seemed to be written in the countenances of those who now bowed before me—lower, certainly, than they had bowed on my arrival.

On the staircase of the Pavilion of Flora I met Duroc, who was hastening up to ascertain the result of my conference. He had desired the usher of the salon de service to inform him as soon as I left the Emperor. He was overjoyed at the account I gave him, but had guessed that all was well from the extraordinary length of the audience.

"Now," observed he, "you will sleep tranquilly; and so shall I, for you must know that that poor fellow Junot has caused me much pain. He wrote me a most unreasonable letter. But without telling him in a direct way what I now say, you may warn him against thoughtlessly giving his friends so much annoyance. Good night, Ma-

On the morning which succeeded this interview, I waited on the Grand-Duchess of Berg to tell her the success of my mission. I was bound to make an early visit to her in return for the kindness she had shown me. I told her that M. Prevost was to leave Paris for Lisbon next day, and requested her to be kind enough to write by him to Junot and scold him well, as I had already done and as Duroc had promised also to do. She was extremely pleased to hear my account of the conversation I had had with the Emperor.

"Do you know," said she, "that you are perhaps the only woman who can say she has been closeted an hour and a half with the Emperor, unless there were other reasons for the interview than to talk over a serious matter of business? Were there any such reasons in your case?" added she, laughing.

"If there had been," replied I, falling into her vein of pleasantry, "I should hold my tongue. Such, I imagine, is the best way to play one's part on such occasions, and the Emperor, let me tell you, is not the man to render the part an easy one."

"What part?" replied the Grand-Duchess, who during my reply to her question had regarded the expression of my features with extreme attention, while she bestowed but little on my words.

"That of a favorite," replied I; "and this I had an opportunity of observing the other evening at your Imperial Highness's masquerade. Just when the confusion occasioned by the presence of Mademoiselle Gu——t suspended the conversation, I happened to be very near the Emperor—I mean the real Emperor, and not Isabey. He was engaged in conversation with a lady whom I easily recognized by her movements. I did not wish to overhear either what she said to him or what the Emperor said to her for I have no taste for eavesdropping—but wish that a woman should expose me to the world as a feeble and heartless being.'

"'Heartless! the heart would be precisely the pleader which would speak in your behalf,' replied the lady with animation.

"The Emperor, to my great satisfaction, rejoined:

"'Pooh! the heart, forsooth! You are like all the rest of your sex — deluded by your silly dreams. The heart! what do you know about the heart? Nothing, but that it is a portion of your body through which passes a large vein where the blood circulates more rapidly when you run than when you walk. Is not this all? But what is the matter here?'

"With these words he rose, offering his arm to the lady, whose stooping figure would have enabled me to recognize the Emperor, even though he had not been recognizable through his own disguise. They moved to the spot where the pretty Mademoiselle Gu——t stood, bathed in tears, and overwhelmed with despair. They, however, soon returned to their seats.

"'There!' said the Emperor; 'there is one of the results of your romantic ideas! That poor girl has reposed faith in the honeyed words of the handsome stripling Murat! She will now probably go and drown herself. How? What is it you say?'

"He inclined his ear, and at the moment I distinctly heard sobs. The Emperor, no doubt, heard them also, for, instantly rising from his seat, he said to the weeping mask:

"'My dear, I do not like to see Josephine weep—she whom I love better than all other women! Therefore, this is nothing but wasting time. Adieu! I come to masked balls to amuse myself.'

"With these words he walked away, and mingled in the crowd, where Rapp and Duroc soon joined him."

"No," replied I, laughing. "Methinks dancing with tambourines is a little in the gipsy style!"

"And these girls, I assure you," continued the Grand-Duchess, "are little better than gipsies. Their family consists of a mother and three daughters, of whom one, as yet, is quite a child. The other two are grown-up girls. Well, as the fact is now of little consequence, I can tell you that General Junot used to visit these ladies very frequently. You know, they are your neighbors, for they live on the Boulevard de la Madeleine. One of the daughters is excessively pretty; the other is less so, but, then, she is very clever. The young one, as I have told you, is yet a child. Now I have given you the history of this family; and you may perceive that I had MY REASONS for asking you whether you had ever seen Mademoiselle Gu——t dance."

"Will your Imperial Highness," said I, "permit me to inquire how it is that you, who are ever so kind and hospitable to your guests, should have been so severe with Mademoiselle Gu——t?"

The Princess Caroline possessed a countenance in which every feeling of her mind was reflected; and this power of expression was greatly owing to the beautiful transparency of her skin: her cheeks would change from red to pale with wonderful rapidity. At the first mention of Mademoiselle G——t's name, I perceived she changed color slightly twice or thrice; and after some hesitation she told me that the Grand-Duke had bestowed great attention on the young lady, and that therefore she considered her appearance in her house as a great impertinence. For all my pretended ignorance, I knew enough of Mademoiselle Gu——t to be satisfied that I, as well as the Grand-Duchess, had good reason to be offended with her. I may mention that M. de Narbonne, to whom I described the masked ball, burst into an immoderate fit of laughter when week, brought me the following letter, which he sent to Junot by his true friend Duroc:

"MY DEAR JUNOT:—I presented your letter to the Emperor, neither read it to me nor spoke to me on the subject of its contents. Madame Junot, however, who has had the good fortune to converse with the Emperor on the business, will tell you that I have not imagined, in the letter which I was directed to write to you, any things which have no existence.

"His Majesty has explained to Madame Junot his reasons for wishing that one and the same person should hold the two posts of Governor of Paris and Imperial aid-de-camp, and she must be assured that he had not the least intention of removing you from the post of Governor of Paris for the purpose of supplanting you by another person. Far from that, he even suggested to Madame Junot the propriety of your retaining that post, on account of its being the preferable of the two, and because, in addition to its other advantages, it involved that confidential trust which you seem to think is attached exclusively to the other. The Emperor's sentiments toward you have not, you, undergone the slightest change, as his conduct on this subject proves. In a moment of irritation or discontent, you have sometimes been otherwise; but you must banish that thought and no longer render yourself unhappy.

"A good deal is said about our departure for Spain. Ever since we have been got ready, but as yet no final orders have been given.

"The carnival is at length over, happily for those who wish to enjoy a comfortable night's rest. During its continuance, balls and amusements have succeeded each other incessantly. The last was a superb masquerade at the Grand-Duchess's, which afforded a very great amusement.

"Rely, my dear Junot, on my sincerest attachment.

"March 3d, 1808."

Duroc had been greatly hurt by Junot's letter. The fact was that, when Junot was the prey of suspicion, he had no command over himself; and he often said things which were apt to wound those to whom they were addressed. Duroc, however, and all who knew him, were not angry with him, because they were aware that on these occasions, he himself suffered cruelly.

he had been led to believe that the appointment was to be given to Duroc.

"Of all the men by whom the Emperor is surrounded" (Junot said in a letter to me), "Duroc is most deserving of it; there is only one who can possibly dispute with him the preference, and that is Marmont—Marmont, whom I love at once as my brother and my brother-in-arms! Well, I shall cheerfully see him intrusted with the government of Paris for then I shall at least be sure that the Emperor is defended by a faithful friend. Duroc may be placed in the same category; but he already holds an appointment near the Emperor's person. In short, this affair vexes me to the very bottom of my heart."

I had a very long conversation with Duroc on this subject, and he assured me that Junot's suspicion was as unfounded as unreasonable.

"Junot, and some others," said he, "do not appear to understand me, nor to understand my position. The Emperor would disgrace me were he to create me a Marshal of France. What should I be if removed from his person? I love the Emperor as Junot loves him; and has not Junot made choice of the post of first aid-de-camp in preference to that of Governor of Paris? Why should he judge me differently from himself? Besides, is he not my friend—the friend of my heart? Our fraternity of arms is of too old date to be thus forgotten for a brevet."

Duroc was deeply affected by this affair. I found it very difficult to erase from his mind the painful impression produced by Junot's letter, especially as Junot avoided any explanation with him. Friendship is far more sensitive than love.

AT LENGTH the Emperor set out for Bayonne, and then commenced the tragedy which had so important an influence on the destinies of Europe. All the particulars of the interviews which took place in Bayonne between the Sovereign of France and the Sovereigns of Spain are sufficiently known. I say the Sovereigns of Spain, for Spain had then two, and the embarrassment created by the protest of Charles IV. served only, in fact, to give the finishing touch to the work of perdition.

Events now advanced rapidly. Charles IV. proceeded to Bayonne, to appear with his son before the Supreme Tribunal of Napoleon. Ferdinand restored to him his Crown, and the old monarch forthwith abdicated in favor of the Emperor of the French. Here was the commencement of those errors on Napoleon's part which marked ilies. While engaged in writing, M. Magnien suddenly stopped, looked up in the Duke's face, and seemed disposed to say something.

"Well, what do you stop for?" asked Junot.

"I merely stop," replied he, "to see whether an idea does not occur to you, by which you may secure your own fortune and that of your children."

"How?" said Junot.

"Thus," replied the other, "and even if you purpose to take off the embargo to-morrow morning there is yet time. Cotton now sells for thirty sous per pound; to-morrow the publication of the decree will make it worth about five francs on the exchange. Commission me to purchase five hundred thousand francs' worth, and I venture to say that by to-morrow evening you will be a gainer of four millions clear profit, without even opening your purse."

To this proposal Junot at first made no reply. It was a peculiarity in his character always to observe silence on receiving any profound impression. But when a few moments had elapsed he found no want of words to express his feelings. Thus it was in the present instance. After regarding M. Magnien for some moments with his frank and candid look, he said:

"But to whom shall we propose to make this purchase?"

"To the first person we find," replied Magnien; "what matters the seller in such a case?"

"Oh! nothing whatever," replied Junot, his expression becoming more decided as his anger increased, though the other could not divine the reason of the change. "It is a matter of utter indifference whom we rob in the prosecution of so excellent a scheme."

M. Magnien had very large and round eyes, and as Junot uttered these last words he opened them very wide.

take three millions is robbed? And then what, pray, am I but a robber?"

"Yet I cannot see how that can happen in the present case," replied M. Magnien.

"In the devil's name," exclaimed Junot, "do you not see that the man from whom I purchase cotton to-night for one franc and fifty centimes will not have it in his magazines to-morrow to sell for five or six francs, as you say he would, and as I am very glad to hear he will? I am sure that when the unfortunate merchant should find he was deprived of the opportunity of selling his cotton at the advanced rate he would vent imprecations on me and my administration."

"But," observed the other, "he need not know who is the purchaser. The secret shall be sacredly kept."

Junot advanced to Magnien, his eyes flashing fire. The college companion thought he was in the presence of his deadliest enemy.

"Magnien," said he, "thank our old friendship, and still more your own stupidity, for your safety; for your stupidity, I am convinced, has inspired you with this fine project. It is therefore beneath me to be angry with you. For, upon reflection, I cannot believe that you, who, for the last two months have been witness to all my anxiety and solicitude for the declining trade of Lisbon, can seriously recommend me to sink it still deeper by such a swindling trick. For I tell you again that what you advise is nothing else. But enough! write on, and say no more about it."

Junot was violently excited. He said no more, but instantly formed a resolution. He dictated the decree to MM. Fissout and Magnien, and then, calling the aid-de-camp on duty, gave him orders to proceed immediately to the Government printer (the aid-de-camp not knowing the contents of the packet) to see it printed before his an impolitic proceeding on the part of Napoleon, but it was not the only one. The next great error was compelling Ferdinand to abdicate.

The Emperor ought rather to have given him a wife as he desired. He should have seated him on the Spanish throne, controlled all his movements (a thing perfectly easy), and then all would have been well. I am convinced that Ferdinand acted with good faith toward Napoleon, for I have found, among the papers left by my husband, Ferdinand's orders transmitted through Felieu, his Minister of War; and when subsequently the Marquis del Soccoro (Solano) afforded Junot the opportunity of disarming his troops, that was nothing more than the result of the bad feeling with which the Spanish people had been inspired by that multitude of Juntas which harassed Spain by their endless intrigues and infernal spirit. The state of things was, however, very different at Bayonne from the 19th of March, or rather the 4th of May.

Next came the abdication of Ferdinand and his letter, couched in such ambiguous terms that it was calculated to set all Spain in a blaze. But even before the publication of the treaties of Bayonne, many of the towns had declared their independence; Seville, Badajoz, and Oviedo rose immediately on the receipt of the intelligence of the proceedings of the 2d of May.

Palafox, after escorting Godoy to Bayonne, having liberty to depart, availed himself of it to proceed to Saragossa. It is probable, though nothing is known on the subject, that he went there with the view that Ferdinand might transmit orders to him. This, however, is of little consequence; the conduct of Palafox was at all event judicious. While in Spain the storm was gathering which was destined to overwhelm us, Junot was fortifying himself at Lisbon and to use the Emperor's expression really were confiscated, and the trade in that article run into complete stagnation ensued in every other branch, and the Exchange in Lisbon, once one of the most active in Europe, became in a few hours the most deserted.

Of all the valuable qualities which distinguished Junot, none were more remarkable than his clearness and originality of conception. This is acknowledged by all who were employed conjointly with him in any undertaking. The Duc de Valmy, Generals Thiébauld, Taviel, and Boyer, can bear testimony to this fact.

Junot acquainted the Emperor with the obstacles which impeded him. The Emperor immediately commanded them to their fullest extent, and the next day he conveyed an order for the abolition of the Junta, the establishment of a new and complete Government, the Ministers and all the paraphernalia, and the assignment by Junot of the title of Governor General of Portugal, with emoluments worth six hundred thousand francs a year. He still retained his title and office of Marshal of Paris. This, therefore, was the most prosperous period of Junot's life, and the Emperor thus abundantly demnified him for the pain which he had suffered a few weeks before.

Junot had no sooner assumed the post of Governor General than he turned his attention to the amelioration of the country. He wrote the most pressing letter to the Emperor to obtain permission to remove the embargo on cotton goods. This was a measure immediately called for; for how, thought Junot, are we to support the tribute from people from whom we take their property?

The magazines of the East India Company at Lisbon were loaded with cotton from North and South America, and they were, by the embargo, interdicted from exporting it, for to say its carriage by land was prohibited would be nonsense. At length however the prohibition ilies. While engaged in writing, M. Magnien suddenly stopped, looked up in the Duke's face, and seemed disposed to say something.

"Well, what do you stop for?" asked Junot.

"I merely stop," replied he, "to see whether an idea does not occur to you, by which you may secure your own fortune and that of your children."

"How?" said Junot.

"Thus," replied the other, "and even if you purpose to take off the embargo to-morrow morning there is yet time. Cotton now sells for thirty sous per pound; to-morrow the publication of the decree will make it worth about five francs on the exchange. Commission me to purchase five hundred thousand francs' worth, and I venture to say that by to-morrow evening you will be a gainer of four millions clear profit, without even opening your purse."

To this proposal Junot at first made no reply. It was a peculiarity in his character always to observe silence on receiving any profound impression. But when a few moments had elapsed he found no want of words to express his feelings. Thus it was in the present instance. After regarding M. Magnien for some moments with his frank and candid look, he said:

"But to whom shall we propose to make this purchase?"

"To the first person we find," replied Magnien; "what matters the seller in such a case?"

"Oh! nothing whatever," replied Junot, his expression becoming more decided as his anger increased, though the other could not divine the reason of the change. "It is a matter of utter indifference whom we rob in the prosecution of so excellent a scheme."

M. Magnien had very large and round eyes, and as Junot uttered these last words he opened them very wide.

take three millions is robbed? And then what, pray, am I but a robber?"

"Yet I cannot see how that can happen in the present case," replied M. Magnien.

"In the devil's name," exclaimed Junot, "do you not see that the man from whom I purchase cotton to-night for one franc and fifty centimes will not have it in his magazines to-morrow to sell for five or six francs, as you say he would, and as I am very glad to hear he will? I am sure that when the unfortunate merchant should find he was deprived of the opportunity of selling his cotton at the advanced rate he would vent imprecations on me and my administration."

"But," observed the other, "he need not know who is the purchaser. The secret shall be sacredly kept."

Junot advanced to Magnien, his eyes flashing fire. The college companion thought he was in the presence of his deadliest enemy.

"Magnien," said he, "thank our old friendship, and still more your own stupidity, for your safety; for your stupidity, I am convinced, has inspired you with this fine project. It is therefore beneath me to be angry with you. For, upon reflection, I cannot believe that you, who, for the last two months have been witness to all my anxiety and solicitude for the declining trade of Lisbon, can seriously recommend me to sink it still deeper by such a swindling trick. For I tell you again that what you advise is nothing else. But enough! write on, and say no more about it."

Junot was violently excited. He said no more, but instantly formed a resolution. He dictated the decree to MM. Fissout and Magnien, and then, calling the aid-de-camp on duty, gave him orders to proceed immediately to the Government printer (the aid-de-camp not knowing the contents of the packet) to see it printed before his eyes.

Lisbon rendered tranquil on that score, Junot turned his attention to the state of agriculture, and adopted plans which seemed calculated to ameliorate it.

On the successful issue of this undertaking the repose and well-being of a country mainly depend, and Junot was assiduously seconded by the ablest men in Portugal. He directed the marshes to be drained, the land to be cleared, and encouraged the breeding of cattle. These matters being duly attended to, Portugal was sure to be secure from the apprehension of a scarcity of meat and bread—those primary necessities of life. Nor did he allow the army to remain idle, but rendered its presence in Portugal useful to the country; for he employed the troops in the working of coal mines, some of which were discovered at Coimbra and at Moira.

The ceremony of Junot's installation as Governor General was as solemn as it was unexpected. He had convoked the Junta in the Palace of the Inquisition, a large and imposing edifice, situate in the Roscio Square; and without explaining previously the object of their extraordinary convocation, he arrived on horseback, followed by the whole of his staff, and all the individuals he had selected for his Ministers. He delivered a speech, firm and concise, in which he explained to the Junta the orders he had received, and which he was then about to execute. He then declared the Junta dissolved, and proclaimed the new government and the new Ministry.

He did one thing which was both politic and in good taste. He named two Ministers for each department of the Government; for instance, Hermann and Pedro de Mello for finance; Senhor Lunyt and Sampayo for the Marine. Senhor de Lagard, now Councilor of State, was the Minister of Police; he had just then come from Florence, and was an amiable and excellent individual. The Principal de Castro was Minister of Public Worship and of Justice.

These important changes were effected with the most perfect tranquillity, and Portugal soon began to derive benefit from them. Here Junot found his reward, for he experienced the utmost satisfaction at seeing a whole kingdom regenerated under his auspices. He now possessed the power as well as the will to do good. Unhappily a single day sufficed to destroy all his dreams!

Napoleon was still at Bayonne. He had concluded the two treaties with Ferdinand and Charles IV.* Joseph had been recalled from Naples and placed on the Spanish throne. To Charles IV. was assigned Compiègne, and to Ferdinand the Castle of Navarre. Charles IV. had a civil list of thirty millions of reals; Ferdinand, still under the title of Prince of the Asturias (for it must be borne in mind that the Emperor had never given him any other denomination) had only an annuity allotted him of four hundred thousand francs for himself and his descendants; and in the event of his having no issue, this income was to revert to his brother and his uncle.

However, the Emperor allowed Ferdinand an additional income of six hundred thousand francs from the Treasury of France; which, in the event of his demise, was to revert to the Princess of the Asturias. All this produced a singular effect in Paris. Even the French were amazed at this change of Sovereigns. Already the Prince and Queen of Portugal had set the example, and the Spanish Royal Family followed in the track with incredible celerity. Alas! the time was approaching when downfalls of royalty were to become too familiar to us.

The work of Spain's misfortunes was accomplished. Ferdinand VII. had removed from Bayonne to the prison of Valençay, which he was doomed not to leave until six years after, and Charles IV. repaired to Compiègne, where the Governor of the Palace received him and took him into his safe keeping: this was Comte de Laval-Montmorancy. A few days afterward the Emperor received an address from the Supreme Junta sitting at Bayonne, praying that he would send his brother Joseph to reign over Spain. The Council of Castile and the Municipality of Madrid expressed the same wish.

Notwithstanding all that has been said to the contrary, no desire was ever more voluntary or more unanimous; and as the city was not occupied by the French troops the opinions of its inhabitants were freely manifested. Even in the presence of French troops, the silence of the Spaniards was expressive. On the 23d of May, Valencia and Seville were in a state of insurrection, and on the 27th, Saint Ferdinand's Day, the whole of Aragon rose.

* The famous treaty by which Charles abandoned the heritage of his ancestors was signed on the 5th of May, 1808.

The Junta sent the Marquis de Lazan, the brother of Palafox, to recommend the latter to preserve tranquillity; but the mischief had gone too far. I have good reasons for believing that Palafox had received secret instructions at Bayonne from Ferdinand VII.; and there is also ground to suspect that England strongly instigated the insurrectionary movement in Spain.

Such a proceeding was perfectly consistent with the spirit of the British Cabinet. When I was conversing, in 1814, with a member of the English Parliament, he expressed himself sorry that the power of Napoleon had not been attacked by a measure which, in his opinion, would inevitably have been triumphant: this was, to have proclaimed Soult King of Portugal when he wished to attain that dignity. "Imagine," said he, "what would have been the MORAL EFFECT produced in Europe by the defection of one of the first Captains of Napoleon's army!" He was right.

The magistrates and other public authorities fell sacrifices to the popular fury in various parts of Spain. The victims selected were those individuals who had been appointed by Charles IV. or the Prince of the Peace, or those whom the Emperor appeared to have acknowledged. Don Francisco de Borja, commander of the Marine Service at Cadiz; Comte de Torre Fresno, Governor of Badajoz; Don Santiago de Guzman, Governor of Tortosa; Lieutenant General Filanghieri, Don Miguel de Cevallos, Don Pedro Truxillo, the Marquis de Laguila, and Baron d'Albala, were ASSASSINATED AND CUT TO PIECES in the insurrections of Valencia and Seville.

The climate of Madrid did not agree with Murat. He was seized with colic, a disorder which is very prevalent there, and is frequently attended by fatal results. Savary superseded him at the Spanish capital. I know not how the latter discharged his duties; but this I know, that he made himself extremely ridiculous. He used to be served by servants kneeling; I am aware that this may appear incredible; but let those who doubt the fact inquire among the inhabitants of Madrid; the answer will be that General Savary, when at table, had his goblet handed to him by a page on his knees.

About this time the famous provincial Junta was formed at Seville. Doubtless the Spaniards were not disposed to receive Joseph; yet, when the Junta of Bayonne named him as Sovereign, it may be observed that the signatures of those who approved the new constitution were exceedingly numerous. The list includes the names of the Duke del Infantado, the Duke del Parque, the Duc de Frias, the Marquis d'Ariza, the Prince de Castel-Franca, the Comte de Fuentes, the Archbishop of Burgos, the Marquis de Santa-Cruz, the Comte de Fernand-Nunez, Fray Augustin, General de San Juan de Dieu, Fray Miguel d'Acevedo, etc. But in this long list there appeared another signature which was worth all the rest. I will give it, with the letter to which it was affixed, and which is addressed to the Emperor:

“SIRE:—The surrender of the Crown of Spain which has been made to your Imperial and Royal Majesty by King Charles IV., my august Sovereign, and which has been ratified by their Highnesses the Prince of the Asturias and the Infants Don Carlos and Don Antonio, imposes upon me the gratifying obligation of laying at the feet of your Imperial and Royal Majesty the homage of my attachment, fidelity, and respect. I pray that your Imperial and Royal Majesty will deign to acknowledge me as your most faithful subject, and make known to me your sovereign intentions, so that I may give proof of my eager and cordial submission. Heaven grant long life to your Imperial and Royal Majesty for the good of the Church and State!—I am, Sire,

“Your Imperial and Royal Majesty's most faithful subject,

“LOUIS DE BOURBON,

“Cardinal de Scala and Archbishop of Toledo.

“TOLEDO, 22d of May, 1808.”

A fine letter, truly, to be written by anyone bearing the name of Bourbon, even admitting the submission to Napoleon to have been compulsory!

The Emperor was still at Bayonne, busied in making arrangements for the government of his brother Joseph. Murat was declared King of Naples. By thus seating a Prince of his family on every throne in Europe, Napoleon hoped to consolidate his power. Alas! he soon learned by cruel experience that among Sovereigns, as among private individuals, the ties of blood are but a feeble security for the performance of duty when personal interest intervenes.

Murat departed for Naples, accompanied by his wife, who was at length rendered perfectly happy by the thought of filling a throne; for the ducal chair which she had hitherto occupied had been anything but agreeable to her.

Knowing her as I did, I am convinced that her joy at this good fortune must have well-nigh turned her brain. But, after all, this joy was perfectly natural; I do not here mean to convey any reproach to the Princess.

On the 9th of July, after the victory of Medina de Rio Seco* had opened to Joseph a road to his capital, he left Bayonne for Madrid, which he entered on the 20th of July. The new Sovereign was received in profound silence. The Spanish people had not yet had the opportunity of appreciating his good qualities, and, above all, his wish to render them happy. He had not been a week in Madrid when the disaster of Baylen, which was felt in all parts of the Peninsula, obliged him to seek a retreat at Vittoria. The ministers, five in number—Mazzaredo, Cabarus, Urquijo, Azanza, and O'Farril—followed him without hesitation; Cevalus and Pinuela remained in Madrid.

On Joseph's entrance an unfortunate circumstance occurred: this was the absolute refusal of the Council of Castile to recognize him. I am enabled to speak with certainty of this fact. It was not known in France, because, as may naturally be supposed, it was not inserted in the Moniteur. We were so completely kept in the dark that when King Joseph left Madrid to return to Vittoria, for fear of being carried off by General Castaños, who had just beaten General Dupont at Baylen, the Moniteur stated that THE FRENCH ARMY IN SPAIN WAS GOING TO REMOVE ITS QUARTERS TO A PLACE WHERE IT WOULD HAVE THE BENEFIT OF Milder Air and Better Water.

General Vedel has been loudly accused of having abandoned General Dupont. This accusation was probably made only to screen the guilty party. That General Dupont was involuntarily in fault is possible; but, still, he was nevertheless in fault; and the odious affair of Baylen ended with the disgrace of a violated capitulation. It would seem that the Spaniards thought themselves justified in not keeping their faith with men so unmindful of French glory.

While Spain was rising in revolution, while the bonfires of incendiarism were blazing on her hills, and the alarm bell was sounding from all her steeples, we were living at Paris in the profoundest ignorance of the important events which were developing themselves in that neighboring nation. The Emperor was still at Bayonne, for which place the Empress had set out, taking the road through Bordeaux, as it was the Emperor's pleasure that this part of France, which had sustained so much injury from the war, should at least be soothed by fair words and gracious manners, which Josephine so well knew how to adopt. She received orders to make herself agreeable, and she succeeded in enchanting the Bordelais. This I learned when I passed through that town on my way to the Pyrenees.

While the Empress was there the Emperor was at Bayonne organizing, or rather disorganizing, Spain with an ardor which bordered on infatuation: we poor women who were left at Paris waited impatiently even for a single letter which should quiet the alarms unauthenticated rumors could not fail at such moments to inspire; but there stood Bayonne, like a great gulf, between us and our correspondents, and not a word reached us but what it pleased the Master to make us acquainted with. The result of this capital manœuvre, the invention of Louvois, but perfected in our time, spared certainly even greater uneasiness than it inflicted, but kept us in a state of absolute ignorance.

The Emperor returned to Paris early in September. He had remained longer at Bayonne than he intended, but the affairs of Spain had not proceeded quite so passively as he had anticipated. Not only had some impediments arisen within the country, such as the opposition of the Council of Castile, but even the written opinions of those Grandees of Spain who composed that bastard Cortes called the Junta were not adequate to the effect which Napoleon expected from them—the calming and satisfying the public mind.

No tidings arrived of the Army of Portugal, and two months had elapsed without a single letter from that country reaching Paris, when the Emperor arrived from the South to stay only a few days, being about to set out immediately for Erfurth.

My uneasiness about Junot became excessive. I had frequently seen the Arch-Chancellor in the Emperor's absence, and so entirely ignorant did he appear that, unable to believe what was nevertheless a fact, that the Emperor himself had received no letters from Junot, I began to conclude that some great misfortune had occurred. We had then no idea of the nature of the Spanish War, and this total cessation of intelligence appeared impossible. Even an intimate friend of mine, who had means of learning through England what was passing in Portugal, re-received no news; it was distracting.

Immediately, therefore, upon the Emperor's return, I wrote to him to learn if he knew with any certainty that Junot was still living, and supplicating him to send me a single word that might relieve my anxiety. Some days passed before I received an answer, which came at length through the Arch-Chancellor, and with it a lecture upon my presumption in interrogating the Emperor upon matters touching his politics. I thought this remonstrance somewhat singular, but received it with profound submission; and as soon as the Arch-Chancellor left me I dispatched a letter to the Emperor, requesting an audience that same day, as I had a favor to solicit. The Emperor was then at Saint Cloud and I was at Neuilly.

The cause of my request was of some importance. Since Junot had been Governor of Paris, whether he was absent or present, I had always done the honors of the city fêtes at the Hôtel de Ville. This time, as usual, though the Emperor had been absent on the 15th of August, the city was desirous of celebrating the Saint Napoleon, and the list of those ladies who were to receive the Empress had been brought to me for presentation to the Grand Marshal. It was perfectly natural to me to preside at these entertainments, when everything was in its right course; but at present matters were very far otherwise. I felt the unpleasantness of my situation and this determined me to request an audience. I received an order to be at Saint Cloud at nine o'clock in the evening.

On my arrival I found the Emperor in his cabinet, looking upon the little private garden reserved for his use; the door was open, and at my entrance, he stood on the step of the door, looking straight before him with the fixed and vacant stare of a person deep in thought. He started at the opening of the door, and, turning sharply toward me, asked with an expression of petulance why I would not believe what he had ordered the Arch-Chancellor to tell me.

"Your husband is perfectly well—what the devil do you mean by these conjugal jeremiads?" "Sire, my mind is relieved since your Majesty has had the goodness to send me word that I might be easy; but in the situation in which I stand at this moment I am come to entreat your Majesty to permit me to decline going to the Hôtel de Ville to-morrow." He was still looking toward the garden door, but on hearing this he turned hastily round, and said in a very singular tone of voice: "Hem! what do you say?—not go to the Hôtel de Ville? And pray, why not?" "Because, Sire, I fear that some misfortune has occurred to Junot. I beg your Majesty's pardon," I continued with firmness, for his bent brow presaged a storm; "but, I repeat, I have no tidings of Junot—NEITHER HAS YOUR MAJESTY ANY—and I am unwilling to expose myself to hear, perhaps, of his death, in a public ball-room." I know not how I acquired so much audacity, but I had it.

The Emperor looked at me angrily, then shrugged his shoulders, but eventually controlled himself. "I have told you that your husband is in good health—why will you not believe me? I cannot prove it, but I give you my word." "It is certainly enough to satisfy me, Sire, but I cannot write a circular to communicate this satisfactory assurance to the four thousand persons who will be present at the city fête, and who will think it very extraordinary that I should present myself so publicly when I have such strong cause of uneasiness." "And what should these four thousand persons know about your cause of uneasiness?" he exclaimed in a terrible voice, and advancing toward me with an impetuosity of manner which almost made me afraid of him. "This is the result of your drawing-room councils, letters, and all your gossipings with my enemies. You declaim against me; you attack all my actions. What was that which the Prussian Minister, one of your friends, was lately saying at your house about my tyranny toward his King? Truly I am a very cruel tyrant! If their Great Frederick, that they make so much noise about, had had occasion to punish as much disloyalty as I have, he would have done it more effectually. And, after all, Glogau and Custrin will be much better guarded by my troops than by the Prussians, for they have no great cause to be proud of their defense of them."

This was perhaps the tenth time since my return from Portugal that the Emperor repeated to me what had been said at my house. On the former occasions I was conscious that the truth had been told him; but, in fact, I never heard the Prussian Minister, who certainly visited me frequently, say a word that bore the least analogy to the sentiments which the Emperor imputed to him.

The Baron de Brockhausen was a man of great circumspection, very mild, saying little, and perfectly to be trusted. He stood, moreover, in the difficult position of representing an unfortunate and humiliated nation, and no one was less suited to maintain such an attitude. He consequently shut himself up in absolute silence, and, though he visited me almost daily, we sometimes laughingly remarked after his departure: "The Baron has uttered seven words this evening." He was a truly respectable man—an excellent father, and one of the most estimable Prussians I have ever met with.

This knowledge of his character convinced me at once that the Emperor was only endeavoring (to express myself in his own phrase) TO PUMP ME, and I was also certain that if such a subject of conversation had ever been entertained in my society, M. de Brockhausen was the last person who would have opened his lips upon it. I therefore firmly replied that his Majesty had been misinformed, and I would undertake to say that such words as those he had just repeated had never been uttered in my house.

He stamped with his foot, and, approaching me as quick as lightning, exclaimed: "So I have told an untruth?" "I have the honor to answer," said I very calmly, "that your Majesty is misinformed." "Oh! to be sure—that is what you all say when you are spoken to as on this occasion." "According to your Majesty's observation, it would seem that I am not the only person accused, and I think I may affirm that others are so as unjustly as myself." The word ALL had not escaped me.

The Emperor, when anything nearly affected him, and he did not give vent to his feelings in words, concentrated in the expression of his countenance all the weight of his

er. He fixed this look upon me; I looked down, not a fear, as he might observe, but only that it did not me me to dispute in this manner with him.

hen I again raised my eyes, he was still looking at but with a very different, and, to say the truth, very age expression; and never in the course of my life I felt less disposed to endure that expression, or the pretation that might be put upon it.

What are your Majesty's commands?" said I, receding ard the door; the Emperor did not answer immediately, but presently said: "I forbid you to repeat what passed here; do you understand me? See that you y, or I will let you know whom you have to deal with." shall obey you, Sire, not for fear of your anger, but I may not have to blush before conquered foreigners our family misunderstandings."

made my obeisance and prepared to go. I was in e to leave the room; yet I was desirous, before I t, to settle the question which brought me thither, I told the Emperor that it seemed to me more suitable that I should not make my appearance at the Hôtel Ville, where my station placed me in the foreground immediately after the Empress, at a moment when reports e current respecting the safety of the Army of Portugal.

e resumed the expression of sovereignty: "And what," he, in a tone calculated to strike to the heart and e one tremble—"what are those reports?" This I could not resist a sensation of fear, and replied low voice: "They say it is lost—that Junot has e compelled to capitulate like Dupont, and that the lish have carried him to Brazil." "It is false! It is e, I tell you!" and he struck his fist upon the table such violence as to throw down a heap of papers. is false!" he exclaimed again, swearing this time like b-lieutenant of dragoons. "Junot capitulate like Du- ! it is a tissue of falsehoods; but precisely because it id, you must go to the Hôtel de Ville. You must go, ou hear?—and even if you were ill, still you ought o. It is my will—good night."

a returning to my carriage I wept like a child. The eror seemed to be very severe toward Junot and me. ever, upon reflection I felt assured that nothing unfortunate had occurred to my husband, since he insisted so pertinaciously upon my going to this ball. On my arrival at Neuilly I found a friend there waiting to learn the result of my petition; he took the same view of the subject; and when, after a long stroll under the balmy limes which bordered the canal, he took leave of me to return to Paris, I felt reassured, and much more tranquil.

I went to the fête; regulated like its predecessors, and equal in magnificence, I know not why it appeared dull and melancholy. The Emperor either did not come at all, or came but for a moment. I was so absorbed in my own feelings that I cannot now remember whether he came or not. I do not understand how it happened that he who usually was so tenacious of his popularity with his good citizens of Paris should not on this occasion have made an effort to gratify them.

The senatus-consultum authorizing the levy of eighty thousand conscripts of the classes of 1806, 7, 8, 9, and 10, to be forthwith brought into actual service had just appeared, and had struck a kind of stupor upon the city. There was even some talk of calling out eighty thousand conscripts of the class 1810, as yet scarcely eighteen years of age; they were to be reserved, it was said, to guard the coasts. The Emperor knew all the reports that were circulated, and was certainly not ignorant of what was said in the shops of Paris. Here, then, was his motive for insisting on my appearance at this entertainment. Had I been absent, the most absurd of the suppositions current concerning the fate of Junot and his army would have acquired a dangerous consistency.

Thus it is that such men as Napoleon consider private interests and feelings as perfect nullities in the political balance. I have since learned that the Battle of Vimiera, which was fought on the 21st of August, was near destroying Junot and the army! Was the Emperor totally ignorant of this battle on the 4th of September? I think not; no doubt he would have acquired some confused intelligence of it through the medium of England.

This fête was excessively dull, or so at least it appeared to me. The Empress was present a very short time, and would not stay to supper. I had a dreadful headache, but did not like to retire at the same time; it would have looked absurd. I stayed to supper, and some foreigners of distinction accompanied me into a separate room, in which a table of fifty covers was laid. The ladies only took their seats around it; the gentlemen stood behind them.

Comte Frochot, then Prefect of the Seine, was not only a man of sense, but possessed all the qualifications that could be required to take the lead with advantage in such a ceremony. He was a well-bred man, uniting politeness with dignity, and doing the honors of the civic feast with as much ease as those of his own house. In the connection with which my place in the entertainment threw me with him, he acted in the most graceful manner possible; but, to say the truth, in Junot's absence I had no business whatever at the Hôtel de Ville, and matters would have proceeded on this occasion perfectly well without me.

The Count was thoroughly agreeable; and this qualification, so essential in society, was peculiarly useful to him in the vast galleries of the Hôtel de Ville, where were congregated not only the most considerable capitalists of France, but all the great, the noble, the eminent for birth or favor, whom Europe deputed as her representatives at Paris. There was Metternich, the Austrian Ambassador; M. de Tolstoi, from Russia; the Baron de Brockhausen, the Prussian Minister; the Ambassador of Spain, and the crowd of Envoys from the German Courts, among which Bavaria, Saxony, and Wirtemberg held the rank of kingdoms.

About this period I received a confidential and very interesting letter from Madrid, written to me only, by a Spaniard of position and ability. I am obliged to withhold his name, and regret that family considerations impose this reserve upon me. This letter was addressed to me because its writer was a friend of mine, and because, knowing my situation in the Imperial Court, he hoped that I might prove the means of some important truths reaching the Emperor's ears. He did not know that Napoleon never listened to a woman. I regretted, however, that I had not received this letter before my memorable audience, as I should certainly have spoken of some of its contents without giving the whole up to him.

"Spain," the writer says, "is lost; probably you have no idea of the causes of the evil. First on the list stand the disasters of Baylen; Castaños has made great capital of the signature of one of your great officers of the Empire. He reports that the Captains of Napoleon no longer hold by him, since Marescot, who had no reason to sanction Dupont's disgrace (you see I speak as a Frenchman, because I am a man of honor and a soldier), was eager to sign the convention. But this is not all; King Joseph's unfortunate departure from Madrid a week after his entry,—dear Duchess, you know that distrust produces distrust,—by proving to the Spaniards that he had no confidence in them, Joseph pointed out to them the party they should adopt. Oh, my poor country! may the virgin and the saints be her protectors, for she is in great necessity! A Supreme Junta is established at Aranjuez, the beautiful shades of which have witnessed melancholy scenes and bloody tragedies. The waters of the Tagus have been dyed with Spanish blood. A civil war, it is true, divided Spain in the cause of Philip V. and the Archduke. But this is of a totally different nature. The quarrel between your Emperor and the Pope has been the mainspring of the mischief. If you did but know what a catechism is taught the children! All this would have been spared if the Emperor Napoleon had put Godoy upon his trial and caused him to be hanged. Instead of this he treats with him! It is lamentable. I send you a specimen of the catechism which is dispersed throughout Andalusia. How important it would be that the Emperor should see it!"

The following are fragments of the catechism alluded to:

Q. "Child, what art thou?"

A. "A Spaniard, by the grace of God."

Q. "What do you mean by that?"

A. "An honest man."

Q. "Who is our enemy?"

A. "The Emperor of the French."

Q. "What is the Emperor Napoleon?"

A. "A wicked being, the source of all evils, and the focus of all vices."

Q. "How many natures has he?"

A. "Two: the human and the diabolical."

Q. "How many Emperors of the French are there?"

A. "One actually, in three deceiving persons."

Q. "What are they called?"

A. "Napoleon, Murat, and Manuel Godoy, the Prince of the Peace."

Q. "Which is the most wicked?"

A. "They are all equally so."

Q. "What are the French?"

A. "Apostate Christians, turned heretics."

Q. "What punishment does a Spaniard deserve who fails in his duty?"

A. "The death and infamy of a traitor."

Q. "Is it a sin to kill a Frenchman?"

A. "No, my father; heaven is gained by killing one of these heretical dogs."

These were the principal heads of a catechism which the Spanish priests taught the children, as many great persons very well knew.

AT unknown tidings from Portugal reached France; they were disastrous for Napoleon, but honorable for Junot and all belonging to him. How noble was his conduct! The glory of the French arms remained untarnished, and to him alone was that due. How often since his terrible death have I wept over that imperishable monument of his victory over England—the Convention of Cintra! Alas! he to whom his whole life was devoted alone disowned its merit.*

* Junot's movements, on the landing of the English, for the defense of the Capital were in striking contrast to the energy and vigor of his advance upon Abrantes, and his daring seizure of Lisbon when only at the head of an ad hoc guard of a few hundred men.

With the momentary exception of Junot's threat to burn Lisbon if his terms were not complied with, we look in vain for any trace of that vigor which urged the march from Abrantes; we are astonished to perceive the man who, in the teeth of an English fleet, in contempt of fourteen thousand Portuguese troops, and regardless of a population

In my opinion, the Convention of Cintra, obtained solely by the moral force of the character Junot had acquired, was the counterpart of the Battle of Nazareth in Palestine, fought on the 8th of April, 1799, in which Junot, with three hundred Frenchmen, defeated the advanced guard of the Grand Vizier, killed with his own hand Ayoub-Bey, surnamed Abou-Seff (father of the saber), and produced an incalculable moral effect on the two armies of the East.

One evening when Junot gave a ball at the Government House, an officer belonging to the staff of General Thomières, Commandant of Fort Peniche, arrived with pressing dispatches. The tidings they contained were fearful and certain. The English, to the number of twelve thousand men, had effected a landing with an immense train of artillery and every species of warlike munition. Junot directed the officers about him to increase their attentions to the ladies and the gayety of the ball-room, while he himself retired to his closet and ordered General Laborde immediately to march toward the enemy in order to prevent the whole truth from reaching the city at once. It was at this period that a miraculous hen laid a miraculous egg on the High Altar of the Cathedral bearing in raised characters the words "Death to the French." In a few minutes the anathematizing egg was conveyed to Headquarters and estimated at its real value as an ill-executed deception on the part of the priests. Junot laughed at the incident, sent for a quantity of eggs, and directed his of three hundred thousand souls, dared with a few hundred tired grenadiers to seize upon Lisbon, so changed in half a year, so sunk in energy, that, with twenty-five thousand good soldiers, he declined a manly effort, and resorted to a Convention to save an army which was really in very little danger. But such and so variable is the human mind, a momentary slave of every attraction, yet ultimately true to self-interest.

"When Junot entered Portugal, power, honors, fame, even a throne, were within his view; when he proposed the Convention the gorgeous apparition was gone, toil and danger were at hand, fame flitted at a distance, and he easily persuaded himself that prudence and vigor could not be yoked together.

"A saying attributed to Napoleon perfectly describes the Convention in a few words, 'I was going to send Junot before a Council of War, when, fortunately, the English tried their Generals, and saved me the pain of punishing an old friend!'"—Napier's "History of the Peninsular War," vol. i., p. 269.

aids-de-camp to write on each of them in grease that the former egg was a liar, immersed them in acid, and the next morning sent these eggs with their inscriptions in relief to all the altars in Lisbon, together with a written recipe for the correct performance of the miracle.*

For some days Portugal remained in apparent security; but, notwithstanding General Laborde's victory over the English at Roliça, another victory gained in Spain, the announcement of the march of twenty thousand French troops through Braganza to succor Lisbon, the entry of Joseph into Madrid, and the fêtes in celebration of this event, still the spirit of insurrection raged at Lisbon, and was kept in check only by the presence of Junot. It was nevertheless absolutely necessary to meet the enemy.

On the 15th of August, after celebrating the Emperor's birthday by a grand dinner and a splendid performance at the Opera House, Junot returned at midnight to his private apartments, and assembled there the Ministers and General Travot. He told them he was about to set out to give battle to the English; charged them with their immediate duties; pressed with emotion the hand of General Travot, whose noble character he highly esteemed, and to whose care he was confiding the Capital; and quitted the Government House to seek his death—for at that moment he little expected ever to see again his country, his wife, or his children.

I must not here omit an anecdote of a man often attacked, and whom I always feel desirous of justifying. Comte de Bourmont was at this time among the French refugees at Lisbon; it was in his power to go over to the English or to join the Portuguese insurgents, but, instead of doing either the one or the other, he sought Junot and thus addressed him: "Monsieur le Duc, I have never disowned my country; I am a Frenchman; you are attacked, a resolute heart and two stout arms may be useful to you, and I come to offer them: are you willing to place me upon your staff?"†

* A slightly different version of this incident will be found in Napier's "History of the Peninsular War," vol. i.

† Presumably the same M. de Bourmont who volunteered for the campaign in Belgium in 1814, and then betrayed his countrymen in a most treacherous manner when possessed of information to carry over to the enemy.

Junot was, perhaps, of all men in the army the most capable of appreciating such conduct; he approached M. de Bourmont, took his hand, which he pressed warmly, and in a tone of emotion replied: "M. de Bourmont, I not only accept your services, but I pledge my honor that no difficulties shall be thrown in the way of your return to France; you have my word, which never fails." And he kept it effectually. M. de Saint Mezard, an officer of the ex-royal bodyguard, M. de Viomesnil, nephew of the Marshal, and many other emigrants, acted in a similar manner; but the example was set by M. de Bourmont.

Junot then proceeded to meet the enemy, who was advancing upon Lisbon by the route of Thomar, numbering above 13,000 effective troops, besides an army of 60,000 Spanish and Portuguese insurgents, the whole country and all the chances of the future in their favor; while Junot's army barely amounted to 9,200 men, destitute of resources. Under these circumstances Junot was eager to engage, and being, above all, desirous of forestalling an attack, he determined to meet the enemy. The battle took place on the 21st of August; the conduct of the army throughout the day, which the oppressive heat of the weather rendered truly laborious, was such as to maintain the glory of our eagles and the purity of our standards, which, thanks to the valor of their defenders and the ability of their chiefs, returned unsullied to France. Notwithstanding all this courage and zeal, the battle was lost; happily our army remained on the field after the fire had ceased, which enabled them to cover the retreat of the wounded, but we lost 1,000 men killed and 800 prisoners, of which number not more than 150 were disabled.

In these almost desperate circumstances Junot assembled Generals Loison, Laborde, Kellerman, and Thiébault, to consult upon the next steps to be taken. To retreat, even by forced marches, across Spain, was impossible; one chance only afforded a ray of hope. I have not yet mentioned the Russian squadron which Junot found in the Tagus on his arrival at Lisbon, and which had ever since been treated by the French army as belonging to a nation whose chief was the brother of our Emperor's heart.

Junot, then, had a right to expect that the co-operation of Admiral Siniavin, who commanded eight vessels, would be of the utmost value to him in this extremity. He had yet to learn that the assistance of an ally is only to be reckoned upon in the time of success. Siniavin was an unsociable animal, and it may be observed that when the Russians are savage it is not by halves. The father of this Admiral was probably one of the number of those who preferred losing their heads to surrendering their beards; at all events he belonged to a barbarous race. In relating the events of this memorable period I have adhered strictly to the papers left by the Duc d'Abrantès, and to the details communicated to me by the Duc de Valmy and Generals Thiébault and de Laborde.

The result of the conference called by the Duke was to send General Kellerman, furnished with full powers, to the English camp, to see what could be done in the way of negotiation. The English General was Sir Hew Dalrymple, and next under him was Sir Arthur Wellesley, afterward Duke of Wellington.

At eleven o'clock in the morning of the 22d, General Kellerman took the road to Vimiera, and was astonished not to meet with any outposts; for a moment he believed the enemy was in retreat, and he has himself related to me a circumstance which proves the accuracy and acuteness of his judgment. "In proportion as I advanced," said he, "without meeting a single English cockade, my confidence revived and became complete when, on my arrival at the English Headquarters, I found myself admitted to treat on terms of perfect equality." It was not till three in the afternoon that General Kellerman found himself in front of the English outposts, which were precisely in their position of the preceding day, and so great was the uneasiness of the English, that, notwithstanding he had attached his white handkerchief to the end of his saber, he had to face about thirty musket shots before he was recognized as a negotiator.

At length he was conducted to Sir Hew Dalrymple, who had arrived that very morning to supersede Sir Arthur Wellesley, just to sign the Convention of Cintra—truly it was hardly worth while! General Kellerman understood the English as perfectly as the French language, but he took care to conceal his knowledge; in war, stratagem is justifiable, and in the existing situation of the French army it was fair to take every possible advantage. The General's ruse proved extremely useful to him, for, after he had opened the basis of his proposition, the two Generals retired to the embrasure of a window, and he heard one of them observe in a low tone: "We are not in a very good position; let us hear what he has to say."

At this moment dinner was announced, and General Kellerman, having been invited by Sir Hew Dalrymple, sat down with the English officers. The dinner was gay, but so extremely frugal as to satisfy the General that what he had heard of the scarcity of provisions in the English camp was true. While the party continued at table an officer returned who had been sent to Figueras. Nothing having yet transpired to show that the Duc de Valmy understood English, Sir Arthur and Sir Hew inquired eagerly of the officer in English what news he brought, to which he replied: "Sir John Moore has not yet arrived at Figueras." This was the same Sir John Moore whom the Emperor afterward so effectually drove into the sea at Corunna. He was to bring an additional force of fourteen thousand men, the absence or presence of which was of the utmost importance at this crisis.

In drawing up the preliminary articles the interests of our allies were stipulated for. "What!" exclaimed Sir Arthur Wellesley; "do you pretend to include the Russian fleet in your treaty?" "Russia is our ally," replied the Duc de Valmy, "and it is impossible for us to abandon her fleet. But I shall not be sorry if you reject this article, as in that case the Admiral, in his own defense, will be obliged to disembark his crews, we shall be enabled to recall our garrisons, and shall thus obtain a reinforcement of ten thousand fresh and veteran troops, which will enable us to deliver Portugal in three weeks." The two English Generals again withdrew to the window, and General Kellerman overheard the words: "That would be very well, but the ten thousand Russians!" It is manifest that, without intending it, the Russians were very useful to us.

At length the preliminaries were concluded, and General Kellerman returned to the French Headquarters, accompanied to the outposts by Lord Burghersh, and overwhelmed with civilities by the English officers, who having previously entertained a high opinion of his military character, had now received sufficient proof of his diplomatic abilities.

An anecdote related by General Kellerman will prove how generous and noble in social and private life are those same Englishmen whom in public affairs we find so little worthy of esteem. Colonel Taylor, a much esteemed English officer, possessed a remarkably fine horse; its color was dark bay, its figure perfect; but its qualities were even more excellent than its beauty; it obeyed a word as a sign, and went through all the performances of a dog. The Colonel was killed at Vimiera in an engagement between the troops under his command and those of the Duc de Valmy. His horse was taken and brought to the Duke. As soon as the English learned that it was in his possession they requested General Kellerman to set any ransom he pleased upon it, that it might be restored to his regiment, which was anxious to preserve and take charge of it in memory of its master. The General refused the ransom, and courteously returned the noble charger; but the English officers chose a horse of the finest breed, and presented it to the French General, through the hands of Sir Arthur Wellesley, with that peculiar graciousness with which English gentlemen know so well how to adorn their private transactions.

"Ah," exclaimed Junot, "if this Russian Admiral would but second us with six thousand additional men, and such coadjutors as you, I would not quit Portugal!" Nothing was yet signed. General Kellerman undertook this new mission; he proceeded to Admiral Sinlavin; requested of him five thousand men from his crews, undertook to furnish them with arms, and to place them in the forts, whence he would thus be enabled to withdraw a similar number of French troops. The Russian was overpersuaded and promised; but after the lapse of a few hours this man, whom his Sovereign ought to have exiled to Siberia for his baseness, retracted, and wrote to Junot that he could not land a single man; and that, moreover, he should make his own terms with Sir Charles Cotton, the English Admiral. This resolution was an injurious to the Russians as it was to the French, and was, moreover, disgraceful to the former. Junot has told me that he suffered more in receiving this letter from Sinlavin than in the loss of the Battle of Vimiera; a hope betrayed is, in fact, more distressing than the confirmation of an expected misfortune. Then this violation of a pledged word

—this perfidy to an ally! He perceived in the conduct of Siniavin a sort of presage for the Emperor—perhaps a warning, for the Czar might have been equally seen in it. To me it has always been inexplicable that a proceeding, not only so injurious to Junot, but so indefensible in a military point of view, had not procured for its perpetrator the reward of a journey to Tobolsk. Such inconsistency in the conduct of Alexander at the very moment of the conference of Erfurth is perplexing.

Junot, finding himself by the Russian Admiral's proceedings left at liberty to treat separately for himself, nominated General Kellerman to act for him. Sir George Murray was the representative of the English General, and a convention was concluded upon the bases already agreed upon, although the arrival of Sir John Moore with the troops under his command had materially changed the respective positions of the two armies. It is just to acknowledge that honor and good faith characterized the dealings of the English officers.

Notwithstanding the ability of General Kellerman, many difficulties arose, upon which Junot observed: "I ask no favor. If I am refused what I demand for my army, I retire upon Lisbon, blow up the forts, burn the arsenal and the fleet, and, master of both banks of the Tagus, I retreat upon Spain, leaving behind me terrible monuments of my journey." I have heard him lament that he had not executed this resolution; and yet he would add: "I must have starved my army, which would much more certainly have experienced that fate than on its march into Portugal. Under such circumstances every alternative was disastrous." General Thiébault considered the plan to be impracticable; and his opinion as Chief of the Staff, necessarily had great weight in the ultimate decision. With respect to blowing up the forts, and burning the fleet and the city, I believe Junot to have been capable of dotant-Commandant Desroches to the English General in the same capacity.

Having opened the letter which the same aid-de-camp brought to me from Junot, I read the copy it inclosed of this glorious convention, the stamp of perhaps the finest military achievements which the annals of our Revolution record. Let its merits be judged of by a comparison with that of Baylen!

Andoche was expected to land at Rochelle or some neighboring port; I therefore set out for that place on the 4th of October, the day after M. de Grave's arrival, taking with me Madame de Grandsaigne, wife of the first aid-de-camp to the Duc d'Abrantès, but leaving my children in Paris, as I concluded my husband would return with me. Alas! I knew not that the Emperor viewed matters through a medium quite at variance with mine.

The French army was landed at Rochelle and various other ports on the coast. Junot arrived in the "Nymph" frigate, Captain Percy, who treated him with great consideration. The fortune of war subsequently afforded me an opportunity of discharging the debt on behalf of my husband toward a relation of Captain Percy (an aid-de-camp, I believe, to the Duke of Wellington), who was prisoner in Spain. Owing to the opinion expressed by the Emperor, our joy on this reunion was overclouded; our intercourse had not its usual freedom; the future dimmed, we talked not of home. When I spoke of the alterations in our Hôtel, Junot answered with bitterness: "What is it to me? I shall never see it."

On our meeting, Junot opened his heart to me, describing all that he had suffered and was suffering. The Emperor had written him some letters, excessively short as usual, and in the last had told him he must never re-enter Paris without victory, to EFFACE THE REMEMBRANCE OF LISBON. The tears stood in his eyes as he repeated this or retire to his estates. So had Marshal Lannes. Duroc began to be sensible of dependence, and Berthier to feel its full force.

We were one day at table, when we received a letter from Nantes announcing the arrest of M. de Bourmont; upon reading which, with a countenance inflamed with rage, he uttered a terrible oath. "And I had pledged him my word of honor that he might land in perfect safety!" exclaimed he, rising in fury; "this is a trick of M. Fouché. But we will see who gains the day." Accordingly he wrote, and M. de Bourmont was released, but arrested again a few days afterward; on hearing which all my influence with Junot was insufficient to appease him: he immediately set out full speed for Angoulême, through which town he had learned that the Emperor was to pass on his return from Erfurth. I knew that Savary would be there; and though Duroc, Rapp, and Berthier were also of the party, yet, knowing Junot, I feared his violence of character, and dreaded the Emperor.

Nothing could detain him; my entreaties were of no avail. Alas! Napoleon ill understood that strong yet tender spirit, so full of energy, yet as affectionate as that of an enamored woman.

On his return to Rochelle the gloom of his brow had increased, though he had obtained M. de Bourmont's admission into the Military Staff of the Army of Naples with the title of Adjutant General, and also the Comte de Novion's pension of 6,000 francs; the Emperor accorded nearly all he desired.

For instance, M. de Viomesnil, M. de Saint Mezard, and a number of officers of the old régime, who, remembering that they were Frenchmen, refused to bear arms against their country, though they had fled from France when her scaffolds were thirsting for their blood, were indebted to Junot's interposition for the termination of a fifteen years'

Russia gave him so many proofs of fraternal friendship, was a snare of destiny to lure him to his ruin. One anecdote of this meeting is well known, but is too apposite to this subject to be omitted here. When Talma, in the part of Philoctetes, pronounced the line, the Emperor Alexander, rising from his seat, threw himself into the arms of Napoleon with an emotion so manifest and sincere that no one could doubt the sentiment which excited it. I can guarantee the truth of another, and there are Memoirs in existence which will perhaps one day appear, and will confirm it.

When Count Nicholas Romanzoff came about this time to Paris, he was assailed on the way, both by Austria and Prussia, with arguments and inducements to join the famous alliance, to which Sweden was already pledged; but the Russians, M. de Romanzoff, and before him M. de Tolstoi, were inviolable in their fidelity, and turned a deaf ear to all such remonstrances.

Another fact, apparently indifferent, perhaps eventually decided the destiny of Napoleon. Being one day in company with the Emperor Alexander at Erfurth, and conversing confidentially with him as with a brother, Napoleon mentioned Ferdinand VII., spoke of the uneasiness he occasioned him, of the trouble of detaining him in captivity, and of his intrigues with dairymaids (such kinds of amours being always odious to Napoleon, he alluded to them in disgust). The Russian Emperor looked significantly at him for some moments, then, smiling, turned away his head in a very eloquent silence.

“Do you, then, possess a talisman for mastering this evil genius?” said Napoleon, laughing, observing that Alexander shrugged his shoulders with contemptuous impatience. “Why, really,” replied the other, “when the ably he likewise reverted to it when in 1814 a message through the Duc de Rovigo, in consequence of a long conversation that I had held with the Emperor, Russia at my Hôtel in the Champs Elysées, where at that time I still occupied. Unfortunately, in 1808 Napoleon was too much the dupe of Alexander's flattery, and afterward he had not sufficient confidence in his own ship, and afterward he had not sufficient confidence in his own ship. But such was the constitution of his mind, that his sentiments nor actions could ever accord with those of other men.

After several weeks passed at Erfurth in discussing the destinies and most serious interests of Europe, Napoleon crossed the gayest and most brilliant fêtes, Napoleon crossed the gayest and most brilliant fêtes, Napoleon crossed only to march upon Spain, and the Empress returned to Paris to celebrate the commencement of the new year. The Arch-Chancellor gave her a ball in his gloom of the Carousel, formerly the Hôtel d'Elbœuf. I attended a fête given by Cambacérès to be gay, not a ball; but the present surpassed all its predecessors in brilliancy, although D'Aigrefeuille, who acted as Grand Master of Ceremonies, was not so gay with his little sparkling eyes, short, round, and well-attired figure, a sufficient provocation to laughter for those who beheld him.

The Arch-Chancellor's coronation robes had been made with a train much longer than the Emperor could wear, and it was consequently shortened. Cambacérès, as everyone knows, loved economy, and had not the power to distribute the gifts required by his accession to the title of Grand Dignitary without paying too dearly. D'Aigrefeuille a present of the velvet and ermine linings from the curtailed mantle. D'Aigrefeuille had chanted, but as the parings of violet velvet were required too much seaming for a coat, he laid it aside, which unfortunately, coming from the extremity ity of ladies; war with Austria was talked of, and Count Metternich, lately returned from Vienna, notwithstanding his habitual courtesy, wore an air of constraint which his perfect politeness could not entirely subdue.

Count Metternich had made a journey to Vienna toward the end of November, under pretense (though in reality on affairs of the utmost importance, announced previously to leaving Paris) that he should not be more than two or three weeks absent. The Duc de Cadore, forgetting that M. de Metternich was no way accountable to him for his proceedings, thought fit, at this assembly, to rally him in a half-angry tone on his long procrastinated return. "Do you know, sir," said he, "that we may reasonably take exception at this delay; and, indeed, though you still protest that your intentions are pacific, we may justly construe it as a confirmation of the rumors promulgated by the English journals."

"I can only repeat to your Excellency," replied M. de Metternich, "what I have frequently told you on that head, that the Emperor, my master, desires to continue at peace with France. As for the delay of my return, I assure you it had no other cause than the obstacle which the entrance of General Oudinot's corps into Germany presents to free egress by the way of Bavaria."

The acuteness and fine tact of this reply bears the stamp of the school of the Prince de Ligne. I afterward asked M. de Metternich if he had really made it; he laughed, but gave me no answer. "Did you say so?" I again asked. "Should I have done amiss if I had?" said he, still laughing. "Certainly not." "Then probably I said so, but I do not remember it." The words, however, were actually his; and the Duc de Cadore had not capacity to contend with this model of all that the high aristocracy can furnish of elegance and exquisite polish, combut it was then too late, the mischief was irreparably done. He had been treated at Court with a coldness that showed no friendly intentions. As an instance, among others, of the disrespect he experienced, his Countess was once, on a grand Court Day, neither invited to sup with the Empress nor with either of the Princesses; to complete this insult, an article was inserted in the "Moniteur," under diplomatic auspices, detailing an imaginary conversation between the Ambassador and the Duc de Cadore, which certainly never occurred, in which the former, in demanding the cause of the slight offered to his lady, was made to appear in a most ridiculous light.

M. de Metternich, thus publicly humiliated, annoyed in his domestic privacy, attacked in his most valuable privileges, deceived in all he had a right to expect from the justice of a Sovereign whom he approached under a title sacred even among savages, wounded in his dearest affections when his wife and children were detained as hostages in Paris, his very life menaced, constrained to fly like a criminal in a carriage with closed blinds, must have been more or less than man could he have excluded resentment from his bosom.

He became the irreconcilable enemy of France; whereas, dazzled by Napoleon's genius, he might have been irresistibly influenced by the same charm which enthralled the Emperor Alexander. Austria declared war against us at that sinister moment when our political horizon was darkening on the side of Italy, and the Emperor was seeking victory in the mountains of the Asturias. Napoleon's parting words to the Legislative Body, when joining his army in eager pursuit of the English, were: "THEY HAVE AT LENGTH INVADED THE CONTINENT."

His anticipations of victory were justified by the event; he saw the leopards of England fly before him the moment he appeared: Moore and his troops were driven out

The Marshals' hall was filled, and supper was laid in the Gallery of Diana. I was among the last arrivals in the Throne Room, and very inconveniently seated—a circumstance, however, to which I was indebted for the choice of a seat in the Concert Room. Madame de Remusat smiled as she recognized me, and the direction of her eye led me to observe that the Empress was giving an order to M. de Beaumont, who, a few moments before the concert concluded, announced to me her Imperial Majesty's invitation to supper.

Scarcely had I paid my respects, on approaching the Empress, when her Majesty motioned me to sit down beside her, and fixed her eyes with an inquisitorial expression upon the rose of yellow diamonds in the center of my wreath. I have since learned that this was at the instigation of the Emperor, who was very curious to know the truth respecting this wonderful rose, FORMED OF A SINGLE BRILLIANT. A smile of intelligence showed that she detected, at the second glance, both the absurdity and malignity of the reports that had reached the Emperor.

The Empress was sometimes thoughtless, but her nature was kind, and in this instance she showed it. Leaning toward me, she whispered:

"Do you know you have been ridiculously misrepresented to the Emperor? and Junot must needs give color to the rumors by talking nonsense! He knows very well diamonds cannot be hollowed; then why should he have said anything so absurd? The consequence is that your courtyard is reported to be paved with gold, that your diamonds are too heavy to be worn, and that you have a Court dress embroidered with brilliants."

Here I could not suppress an exclamation, but the Empress, by a sign, imposed silence, and whispered to me:

Mogul diamonds must have hidden their diminished brilliancy before the superior splendor of this newly discovered rival.

I have already accounted for the history of the diamond rolling about my courtyard, and for the value which my husband thought fit to attach to my jewel case; neither was there any reference in these reports to the Portugal diamonds so widely reputed destitute of foundation, but that it also might be traced to its origin, as in vindication of my husband's honor I myself called on to explain.

The principal—or, at least, the most valuable—part of the Prince Regent's baggage, when he quitted Lisbon for Brazil, was composed of all the jewels and other treasures of the Crown. He was desirous also to have taken all the church plate and jewels; this, however, M. d'Araujo, though his influence was declining, found means to prevent; but all the treasure the Prince could obtain possession of, he transported with himself, including the Brazilian ingots of gold.

But the Cabinet of Natural History at Lisbon was furnished with a facsimile of the famous Portugal diamond as large as an apricot, cut in white wood, and inscribed with the exact weight of the original stone. This I had brought away; and considering the general renown of the diamond, I thought it might be amusing to show it to the learned of Paris to examine its portrait, or more properly its statue, which I accordingly showed to Millin, and afterward to Devois, my jeweler; not that I made any secret of it, but it never occurred to me as an object of curiosity, except as connected with science. One night, however, I exhibited it openly in my drawing-room, and not a fortnight had elapsed before all Paris, and even the provinces, rang with the news that the Portugal diamond was in my possession; and that the fact was incor-

TO RETURN to Junot. In the momentary opportunity that he had to converse with the Emperor at Angoulême, he said to him: "Sire, the only favor that I solicit from your Majesty is to send me again to Lisbon. Let me replace with glory on its walls those eagles which I brought thence undisciplined. I entreat you, Sire, suffer me to return to Lisbon." The Emperor promised, and appointed him to the command of the 8th division, formed of the same troops which had evacuated Portugal in consequence of the Convention, and were inflamed with desire to reconquer their lost title of the "Army of Portugal"; while Junot himself, not humiliated, but sensibly distressed by his retreat, had never so ardently longed, as he expressed it, TO DRAW A TRIGGER.

He hastened his departure; and the Prince of Neuchâtel wrote to him on the 16th from the Emperor's headquarters at Chamartin, a league distant from Madrid, an order to repair to Burgos, there to collect and organize his forces and supplies with all expedition, and, in case of need, to support Soult at Saldanha, concluding with

The following is a second letter received by Junot, dated also from Chamartin the very next day, and before the date is inserted, in the autograph of Berthier the word "noon."

"Chamartin, 17th of December,

"Noon.

"The Emperor commands, M. le General Duc d'Abrantès, that you set out personally, immediately on the receipt of this letter, attended only by your aid-de-camp, and repair to Saragossa, where you will take the chief command of the 3d division, now under the command of the Duke of Conegliano, his Majesty having thought fit to summon that Marshal to the Imperial Headquarters in order to appoint him to another destination. The Chief of your staff of the 8th division will remain with that division, and General Harispe will remain with the third. The Duke of Conegliano has orders to go with him only his aids-de-camp; you will, therefore, find the commissariat, artillery, and engineer department of that army complete. You will leave the provisional command of the 8th division to the senior General. You will likewise leave all the staff officers, engineers, artillery, and commissariat in their present state. YOU ADVANCE TO PORTUGAL, SARAGOSSA MUST FALL. His Majesty, M. le Duc, confers on you the command of Navarre, Pampeluna, and the 3d division. The Duke of Treviso is at this moment before Saragossa. He is especially instructed to cover the siege of that town from the side of Barcelona and of Catalonia. You, M. le Duc, are directed with the 3d division, now placed under your command, to besiege Saragossa and reduce it. I give you notice that General Guilleminot and Adjutant-General Loucet are marching with four thousand mousquetaires, or mountain chasseurs, by the valley of Aragon upon Jaca. Their corps is at your disposal. His Majesty recommends you to leave Pampeluna no more than the garrison absolutely requisite for the defense of the town and citadel, in order to strengthen, as much as possible, the besieging corps before Saragossa.

"You will find herewith the order to the Duke of Conegliano to surrender into your hands the command of the 3d division, of which he is to be informed only by yourself, and in person; you will perceive the importance of this necessary disposition to prevent a momentary lapse or uncertainty in the command.

"Press the siege of Saragossa vigorously. You will find General Lacoste, the Emperor's aid-de-camp, very useful: he is well

Junot set out for Saragossa with a heavy heart; but I will venture to say the Emperor was in error in not sending him to Portugal with the 8th division: that army was recruited by him and attached to its chief, and every member of it regarded Lisbon as an Eden.

Junot's letters from the siege of Saragossa, if the successive attack of every house can be called a siege, were truly distressing. While the plague which raged within the city extended its ravages also beyond the walls, and continually forced upon the Commander the heartbreaking spectacle of his soldiers perishing at his feet from a disease more mortal than the balls of the enemy, a fresh house was every day assaulted, which the Spaniards defended from room to room; and every foot of ground conquered was the grave of a Frenchman or a Spaniard. "I cannot endure this sight," wrote Junot; "I want a heart of stone, or, rather, I should have no heart."

One of our most intimate friends was a prisoner in Saragossa; and Palafox, to whom he was related, had confined him to shelter him from the popular fury; the melancholy tone of the letter in which Junot informed me that he had acquired this information, showed how much he dreaded the idea of springing a mine under the feet of his friend. He had undertaken this siege against his will, and with a disinclination that pervaded every act and event connected with it, and affected his health; he suffered acutely from his wounds, especially from that which graced his left cheek and those in his head generally.

In the month of January he wrote to me: "There are moments in which I am tempted to blow out my brains. If my hand was not withheld by a remembrance of thee and of my children, one touch of the trigger would terminate my sufferings." This letter terrified me, but I did not yet know all. The Emperor would not endure an hour's delay in the execution of his commands, and he had Yet did the Emperor, with reports before him add directly to himself, detailing the result of every operation showing that the troops were daily led against him whence, under safe cover, fell showers of balls, concluding that this siege was not at once brought to a close. It is painful to reflect on the misery thus inconsiderately inflicted on an ardent and affectionate heart like Junot's which was as much grieved as revolted by such injuries.

After the Emperor had dispatched Junot to Saragossa he summoned to the Imperial Headquarters all the General officers who had belonged to the Army of Portugal. The following account of General Thiébault's audience was written by himself for these Memoirs:

"Having been ordered to repair to the Headquarters at Valladolid, I arrived there at the moment the Emperor was going to the parade, and followed him thither. General Legendre, ex-chief of General Dupont's staff, was also present, and it was there that the Emperor asked 'How is it that your hand did not wither in thus signing the disgrace of France?' There seemed to be a fatal coincidence of our arrival, since there was an analogy though no identity, in our situations. I knew I could not reproach myself with sacrificing nothing to the preservation of wagonloads of stolen gold; but still I was the ex-Chief of the Staff of an army which, in yielding to the enemy in the country it was intrusted to defend, had saved only appearances. I congratulated myself, therefore, on receiving an order during this parade, and was walking contented in my lodgings, when General Savary overtook me, and said 'The Emperor orders you to be at his quarters in a quarter of an hour.'

"While preparing to appear before Napoleon, in the circumstances of moment, although I had nothing of my own part to justify, it was impossible to wave the

I should have gratified many of them by contributing my mite of calumny against him, but in so doing I must have disgraced myself; for it is always dishonorable to inculcate a Commander in the opinion of the Sovereign. I loved the Duc d'Abrantès, and was under obligations to him; but could I have cancelled both these considerations, my resolution would have been the same—to undertake his defense.

"When I entered the great Hall of the Palace of the Inquisition, of which the Emperor occupied the first floor, Napoleon was traversing it between the fireplace and the middle window, and as he paused until I approached him, and then resumed his promenade, I walked beside him during the hundred minutes of a conversation of which I here give some fragments. 'Well,' said he, prefaced only by GOOD MORNING, SIR, 'so you capitulated to the English, and evacuated Portugal!' 'Sire, the Duc d'Abrantès yielded only to necessity, and extorted an honorable treaty from men who, if commanded by him, would not even have granted us a capitulation.' 'The loss of Lisbon was the necessary result of the Battle of Vimiera. It was there, sir, that you should have defeated the enemy, and not have committed such serious errors.'*

"I comprehended that the Emperor was resolved not to name the Duc d'Abrantès, and therefore I did not regard the you, when addressed to myself, as anything personal: on the other hand, aware that the tactics of that battle could not be defended, I felt it better to be silent than to enter into discussion with him. He continued: 'And pray, sir, where did you learn to attack in front an enemy who occupies a formidable position? You might as well take a bull by the horns, or knock your head against a wall. Did Marshal Soult proceed that way at Corunna? No! he turned the enemy, and drove him out of the Peninsula.' 'Sire, Marshal Soult, at Corunna, was opposed to engaged at Vimiera an enemy who, during the battle [and beyond the possibility of such an event being anticipated], was reinforced by five thousand men, who were disembarked within sight of his camp. And if the Duc d'Abrantès could not force the position of Vimiera, neither did Marshal Soult prevent the embarkation of the English army. As for the manœuver you have done me the honor to point out, Sire, new examples are unnecessary to the demonstration of that great maxim forever established by you Majesty's immortal campaigns—that an enemy may be annihilated by force, but is defeated by skill.' A short silence ensued, the Emperor looking at me.

“‘Besides, sir, is it with fragments of your army that you should meet an enemy? You had twenty-six thousand men, and fought with ten thousand! And that because you had scattered more than twelve thousand men at Peniche, at Almeida, at Elvas, at Santarem, at Lisbon, in the fleet, and on both banks of the Tagus.’”

“‘I am entirely mistaken, Sire, if the separation of nearly the whole of these brigades and garrisons from the main army was not inevitable; and if your Majesty will suffer me to submit a few observations for your consideration, I presume that you will find in them some justification of the Duc d'Abrantès.’ His silence authorizing me to proceed, I added: ‘The English army that was disembarked on the coast had no place of refuge, and, on the loss of a single battle, would have been under the necessity of abandoning its baggage and wounded. So situated, the acquisition of Peniche was important to General Wellesley, and for the same reason it was incumbent on General Junot to prevent his taking it, more especially as the Peninsula is as easy of defense as difficult of attack; and Peniche lost, Sire, it is evident that all must few brigs and corvettes. These vessels, Sire, were necessary not only for defending the mouth of the Tagus, and supporting the Russian fleet against any enterprise of the English blockading squadron, but also to guard the pontoons occupied by the Spanish troops we had disarmed, and to keep Lisbon in check. In such critical circumstances the ships could not be left to their crews; this was the reason for having placed there one thousand men; I will say nothing of the forts.' 'The forts must be defended. But what necessity for pushing two thousand men to the left bank of the Tagus?'

"Sire, that measure was suggested by considerations of equal delicacy and importance. Eight Russian vessels, under the command of Admiral Siniavin, were blockaded in the Tagus. The only good anchorage in that road is near the left bank, which was covered with insurgents, increasing daily in numbers and hardihood, who, had that bank been evacuated by us, would soon have been reinforced by detachments from the English vessels; and as they would have lost no time in bringing guns to bear, the situation of the Russian fleet must have been untenable, and the difficulties of our own situation in consequence greatly aggravated. What complaints, Sire, would that Admiral, in such a case, have addressed to his Court! An Admiral, who, moreover, only sought an excuse to make common cause with the English! May he not have speculated on surrendering, and imputing that step to a willful desertion? And how much would the Duc d'Abrantès have been distressed to have furnished him with such a pretext, or to have occasioned any grievance to the Emperor Alexander. Political motives, therefore, decided our military arrangements.'

"To this the Emperor made no reply, and walked for some time in silence.* At length he said: 'And San-

'That may be the case, Sire, in regular, but not in popular wars.' (ANOTHER LOOK.) 'In the latter, Sire, the capital is always the most dangerous and most difficult to restrain. And when, like Lisbon, it constitutes an important part of the State, to abandon it is to lose all its resources, and every other dependence with it.' Again he fixed his eyes on me in silence; then advanced a few steps, and at length said: 'But Elvas, sir, and Almeida—what need was there of garrisons there?' 'We expected succor, Sire; General Dupont's division appeared to be marching on Lisbon, either to secure the possession of Portugal, to open a retreat for us, or to command the West of Spain. This division could reach us only through Almeida or Elvas. To abandon these fortresses, therefore, comprised the abandonment of the entire provinces in which they are situated. So, at least, the Duc d'Abrantès judged.'

"These reasons being admitted, and other questions or subjects furnishing me with an opportunity of enlightening the Emperor with regard to the Duc d'Abrantès, I described the distress he suffered, under the fear of displeasing or grieving his Majesty, and perceived that the Emperor listened with satisfaction; and, as if pleased with the part I had acted, was thenceforward much more unreserved. The new campaign which the Emperor was about to open in Portugal, under the auspices of Marshal Soult, served as a theme for continuing the conversation. In describing the itinerary the Marshal was to follow, his Majesty observed: 'It is substituting the crossing of rivers for that of mountains.' In fact, the line of Galicia embraces the crossing of the Minho, the Douro, the Vouga, and the Mondego. 'Sire,' I answered, 'the passage of the most formidable rivers is preferable to that of the mountains in Beira and the Tras-os-Montes. The difficulties of the passage of rivers and the means of sur-pleased with a reply so entirely in accordance with the plans he had traced, and, on the whole, appeared satisfied with the interview."

The Emperor once more returned to Paris after having defeated Sir John Moore, taken Madrid, and, as he believed, chastised the Spaniards. The brilliancy of his Court was great, but still more clouded by fears and anxieties than in the preceding year. "War! war!" was the universal text of the Emperor. Cardinal Maury, M. de Cheval, Comte Louis de Narmy, the physician Halley, Millin, all my friends, conversed on coming events with an anxiety that alarmed me. All agreed that the dangers of the Northern war would be increased tenfold by that of Spain. Alas! I knew it but too well, and saw around me nothing but uneasiness and the troubles of many friends.

Junot was at this time interested in the exile of Madame de Staël and Madame Récamier, because, at the request of the former, and convinced that the Emperor might by mildness have converted her into a partisan as useful as her enmity would be dangerous, he had made every effort to soften him in her favor, until Napoleon in a rage, exclaimed: "So! you, too, are going to ally yourself with my enemies." "It is extraordinary," said Junot one day to me, when speaking of the exile, "that the Emperor, who knows enough of my heart to be assured that my blood and life are at his service, will connect you and me with his enemies! His enemies are mine, with only this difference, that I desire no vengeance on my own, while I would exterminate his."

Madame Récamier's exile was shortly after this announced publicly, in consequence of her visit to Coppet, and occasioned sensations to Junot such as he doubtless little expected to have experienced from any of the Em-does you equal justice, and cherishes for you the attachment I should have so much rejoiced in. I had hoped to bring you together next spring; and how are my wishes frustrated? Alas! by a blow which renders desolate the future existence of an unfortunate woman, who deserves the homage of all who pronounce her name. My Laura, I conjure you to see the Empress—see Queen Hortense—see the Emperor—but no, you must not speak to him. Alas! how can he who is so just, so great, so remarkable for goodness—how can he voluntarily oppress a feeble woman?”

Madame Récamier deserved all the eulogies Junot poured upon her: not he only, but Murat, Eugène, Bernadotte, Masséna, and many other brave and loyal French patriots, regarded her with real friendship, and proclaimed her the best as well as the most beautiful of women. My own friendship for her is founded on the conviction that the most noble and generous sentiments animated her pure heart.

There are circumstances in her history the importance of which her almost infantine innocence was perhaps incapable of fully discerning. M. Récamier, before his reverse of fortune, wishing his wife to enjoy all the pleasures natural to her age, gave her a country house at Clichy, to which the best society of Paris immediately flocked, and Madame Récamier, in the full blaze of beauty—young, gay, and happy—thought only of benevolence and amusement. But the serpent found access to this Eden, and to its pure and beautiful Eve. Fouché presented himself, and his station insured his admission. He soon invited her to accept the post of lady of honor to the Empress. “I have no inclination for it,” she replied, in a soft and insinuating tone, as though fearful by too positive a refusal to provoke the vengeance of court persons for the established your reputation; it is pure and unblemished. You are privileged to be the Emperor's friend, for it is a friend and not a mistress that he wants;" and so saying, his little twinkling eyes ran over the figure of the young Psyche, while her countenance beamed with native modesty, intelligence, and sweetness.

"I know the cravings of the Emperor's heart," he added; "I know he is unhappy at not being understood, and that he would gladly exchange hours of victory and noisy acclamations which play round the ear without reaching the heart for a few minutes of social and confidential converse. He is weary, too, of daily encountering scenes of jealousy, from which the pure and sacred connection I wish to see established between you and him would be exempt." "But," objected Madame Récamier, quite unconvinced by these profound arguments, "how can I ascertain that it would be agreeable to the Emperor that I should accept this situation? But especially how would it please the Empress, whose establishment is full, that I should displace either her niece, or her friend Madame de La Rochefoucauld? Moreover, I tell you, I love my liberty." "I recommend nothing to you that will interfere with your liberty; you are not requested to undertake any burdensome duty. Your post in the Household will be that of the Empress's friend, but particularly the Emperor's. The friend of Napoleon! the friend of the Emperor! consider a little! reflect on my proposition, and I am certain, if you are not prejudiced, your noble and generous soul will accept it with delight."

Madame Récamier was mortal, and it must be acknowledged that the friendship of Napoleon was at that time an ignis-fatuus capable of dazzling any being not wholly ethereal even to ruin. The idea of swaying with a kindly influence the destinies of so many millions of men—of friend. And how is one to be selected for him from among the multitude of our Court ladies?"

Shortly afterward the Princess inquired whether Madame Récamier liked the theaters, and which she preferred. She was partial, she replied, to the Comédie Française.

"Oh, then," said the Princess, "my box is at your service; it is in the lower tier, and therefore requires no ceremony of dress: promise me to make use of it." Madame Récamier promised, and the next morning received the following note:

"The managers of the Comédie Française are informed that her Imperial Highness the Princess — gives Madame Récamier admission to her box. They are likewise informed that when Madame Récamier uses the box she is at liberty to choose her own company; and that no person is to be admitted, even though a member of the Princess's or the Grand-Duchess's Household, without Madame Récamier's special permission.

"Secretary to her Imperial Highness the Princess —."

Madame Récamier's unsuspecting mind received a new light from the perusal of this billet; she returned thanks, but never made use of it. The box faced the Emperor's. Will it now be said that men take no revenge? I hope, and would fain believe, that the Emperor was not concerned in all this. But Fouché, by promoting her exile, revenged the overthrow of many ambitious projects. He would gladly have restored the halcyon days of Louis XIV., or of Louis XIII., and Mademoiselle de La Fayette; and he himself, by retracing one step only, might have enacted a second Père la Chaise, though I believe the red satin would have been more agreeable to his inclinations.

Reverting to Lisbon, I cannot deny myself the pleasure of relating an interesting trait of the Duchesse de Cadaval, and an ingenious method of awakening the memory of a friendly enemy. The Duchess, whose sweetness and intel-

Lisbon, without protection, she was much concerned for its fate, being unable, under such circumstances, to recommend it in writing to Junot's care, or to confide a message for him to anyone.

But an old servant, whom she had left behind, begged to speak with the Duke immediately on his arrival, and requested that he would visit the Hôtel de Cadaval. He complied, and the aged valet led him into a small parlor habitually occupied by the Duchess. Here everything was in the neatest order, and an escritoire purposely left open contained nothing but the very letter in which Junot protested his friendship and desire to prove it. He was thus furnished with the means of testifying his sincerity.

How much must the Duchess now suffer on account of the war which devastates her adopted country! I knew her amiable and excellent son, now the victim of popular odium, when he was the joy and happiness of his mother and family. His sister Adelaide, older than himself, was an invalid, and could not walk; but her two young brothers would lift her by the shoulders and pass whole hours in assisting her to take exercise, never suffering a domestic to relieve them of their fraternal duty.

Junot was long detained before Saragossa; my brother-in-law, who arrived from thence at Paris, gave some dreadful details of the siege, and another letter of Junot's still increased my anxiety.

"When man is in a state of suffering," he wrote, "he must possess a legitimate power to arrest his suffering, and suicide is his most natural and rational course."

I mentioned this letter to Duroc, who desired to see it, and having read it, struck his forehead in sorrowful apprehension; for that excellent friend knew that, three days before, Marshal Lannes had been ordered to Saragossa with the Direction-in-Chief of the siege, in which he was to be matter of mere arithmetical calculation; and the arrival of Lannes to snatch from him the fruits of his long and barren toils was a severe blow to my husband.

General Rapp, one of the best of created beings, refused the command of the 6th division in Russia, when, Junot having offended, Napoleon would have superseded him. Yet in Russia appearances were against Junot, whereas at Saragossa they, as well as the reality, were in his favor. Lannes was indisputably the bravest of all our Generals, and Junot always did him justice; but in this instance he performed the part, in the military phrase, of a BAD COMRADE. That Junot so regarded the act is evident, because he told me the following spring:

"I ordered my horses, and was on the point of departing, when I heard the sound of the cannon, and was riveted to the spot. . . . Otherwise . . ."

He had conducted the siege, or rather the reduction of houses and convents erected into redoubts, from the 20th of December to the month of February, when Lannes undertook the easy task of overwhelming the ruined remnants. To avoid useless repetition, I will only add that a final attack was directed against that heroic city through the Corso; moving batteries were brought to bear; and at length, utterly exhausted, it fell. Junot courted death on that sanguinary day, marching through and over fire; but, strange to say, he, who had been wounded in every former collision with an enemy, escaped unharmed through the fury of this struggle.

He wrote to me on the morrow that Marshal Lannes had contrived to make even success irksome to him, by taking no more notice of him in the report than if he had been meanwhile engaged in the siege of Seringapatam, except by merely saying: "At this time the Duc d'Abrantès was crossing the Corso."

without warm clothing, almost without nutriment, and by the hand of a friend, restoration to life, and happiness, to the enjoyment of the azure sky and pure breeze—all these joys were too much for his head. He was enjoined strict abstinence, promise of compliance, and was at first obedient, but afterwards unable; fell ill, and died at the end of a week, in agonies, at the age of thirty-nine. His brother, Pignatelli, died also far from his home, in the arms of his servants at an inn, on his road to the Eaux-Bonnes. He expired amid riches, esteem, affection, happiness, and a lengthened and smiling future in prospect.

Saragossa taken, the fifty thousand infectious diseases which this fatal siege had created thrown into the streets, the trenches, and a sort of hollow tranquillity established, the conduct of the monks was inquired into for the purpose of making AN EXAMPLE—a measure deemed necessary, but, necessary as it might be, likely to operate at least as injuriously as beneficially, especially in the manner in which it was effected.

Several monks were tied up in sacks and thrown into the Ebro; but the river cast them on its banks; the horror and detestation of the French, which they had evinced on discovering their monks strangled and thrown away, was beyond all bounds.

The other monks, it is true, were terrified; in the morning a deputation from the Chapter of Saragossa presented themselves on their knees before Marshal Beresford, entreating the favor of his accepting the small treasure they brought him, a third of the treasure of the Cathedral of our Lady of the Pillar; the other two-thirds were destined for the Ducs d'Abrantès and de Treviso.

The Marshal angrily told the deputed Canons that they should first have offered to the Ducs d'Abrantès and de Treviso the shares intended for them.

The very same evening, however, the Duc de Montebello sent one of his officers to demand the treasure, carried it to Paris.

It is averred on good authority that the treasure Our Lady of the Pillar was rare and valuable. Marshal Lannes, having brought it to Paris, said to the Emperor, "I have brought from Spain some trumpery jewels of no real value, which I will place in any hands your Majesty may appoint. Junot and Mortier were too proud to accept them, as I should have been glad to have done." The Emperor accordingly gave them to Lannes in ignorance of their value.

All the fatigues of the siege, followed by so many annoyances, seriously affected Junot's health. His letters alarmed me that I determined to seek an audience of the Emperor.

"What does she want?" he querulously inquired Duroc.

"I believe she wishes to speak to you of Junot, who has no reason to know from a letter of his which I received yesterday is dangerously ill."

The Emperor was thoughtful for a moment, but his countenance showed more of sadness than displeasure.

"Is not Madame Junot also very ill?" said he, with an expression of interest which did not escape Duroc, who mentioned it to me.

"Very ill, Sire. She is to go to a watering place as soon as the season will permit."

This time the Emperor's gesture showed impatience.

"What ails her?" said he. "These women are always either ill or quarrelsome! Besides, why does she wear so many and such large diamonds? IT IS ABSURD!"

Duroc, notwithstanding his excessive attachment to the Emperor, could not suppress an exclamation, of which Napoleon took no notice, but continued:

"I do not visit Madame Junot of an evening, Duroc; "but when I go there in the morning, I find one in any respect deserving of that title. Your Majesty knows me well enough to be assured that others should not have waited your commands to testify, not say my dissatisfaction, but my regret, to Madame Junot."

"Oh, I know you are not one of those whom the Emperor loaded with favors to be repaid with ingratitude."

"Your Majesty, I hope, does not include Junot in that number?" said Duroc with warmth.

"HE?—oh no! But let that rest. He asks himself if he must be recalled—I will not have my old friend so grieved. Tell Madame Junot her husband shall be placed in a fortnight. I will send Bessières there to conciliate in his manners; he will do his best to appease those enraged Aragonese. But, Duroc, you take no interest in Madame Junot! Now, tell me, like a sensible fellow, were you ever in love with her?"

Duroc laughed outrageously.

"This is not answering," said the Emperor impatiently. "were you ever in love with Madame Junot?"

Duroc, at length composing himself, replied:

"Never, Sire; I may even say the idea of such a weakness never entered my head. The truth is, no, nor I ever thought of such a thing."

There was a seriousness in his tone which the Emperor understood; and taking a few pinches of snuff with more than usual celerity, for he was not fond of being interrupted, to give up his notions, he stepped a few paces over the bridge into the garden, and at last said:

"Well, it is very singular!"

On this subject his own ideas were very singular. I think he seldom gave women credit for any great abilities.

Junot was no sooner informed that his letter of resignation would be dispatched as soon as he could be replaced that he wrote to the Emperor, Duroc, and Berthier, that Spain could not produce a man more capable of governing Aragon than General Suchet, for whom he had great regard. Suchet amply justified his commendation; he was eminently brave, and, moreover, was nephew of the King of Spain, thus being, on many accounts, peculiarly suited to the command Junot requested for him.

Junot received in reply the following letter from the Count of Huneburg (Clarke), Minister of War, dictated by the Emperor himself:

“PARIS, 7th of April, 1808

“MONSIEUR LE DUC:—I have the honor to inform your excellency that, having received his Majesty's instructions relative to the letter you addressed to me by a courier the day before yesterday (5th April), his Majesty has commissioned me to authorize your return to France. General Suchet will replace you in command of the 3d division of the Army of Spain.

“His Majesty, however, desires, M. le Duc, that before quitting Aragon you devote your attention to three important points:

“1st. Determining with the Commandant of Engineers the plan for the fortress at Tudela, and a redoubt on the heights, with two detached bastions to defend the communications with the river. These works are to be originally constructed of earth, but in such a manner as to be capable of successive completion in a more solid form, and of becoming a strong fortification.

“2dly. To put the fortress of Saragossa into a state of siege, and plant ten mortars there to command the city.

“3dly. To order the evacuation of all the artillery, and its transportation to France.

“The Commandant of Artillery is charged to take your excellency's orders for the evacuation of his force, and to submit to you the necessary measures for insuring its safe transport.

“His Majesty likewise wishes the fort of Jaca to be, with all possible dispatch, put into a state of defense, and enabled to preserve the communications with France by way of Paco, etc.

“Accept, M. le Duc, the assurance of my high consideration.

Junot executed these orders; and while awaiting others he wrote to the Emperor a letter of the highest interest upon the situation of Spain, containing information so much the more valuable that the Emperor was at that time but imperfectly acquainted with the occurrences in Catalonia and Aragon.

Suchet's nomination was expedited, and Junot returned to France with the command of a division in the Grand Army. Thus in a few days joy was again diffused around him, and his letters changed their tone—he no longer talked of dying.

Berthier, however, was then in the tragics—almost to that extremity! He had been but a few weeks married, when M. de Visconti died; and although death and buffoonery have but little sympathy, poor Berthier brought them into curious contact.

“Hem!—hem!—Madame Junot!—Madame Junot!—what do you think of that?—hem!—hem!—I was always unlucky!—always!—the deuce was in the man!—hem!—hem!—to betake himself to dying, what the devil! just as I am married.—If he had died but two months sooner!—what difference did it make to him—I just ask you?”

The pauses in this eloquent oration were filled up by fuming and biting his nails; and it was only interrupted to be repeated to another auditor. The M. de Visconti, be it observed, was known only by Berthier's report. As for the beautiful widow, she married secondly—whom do you think? not Berthier, he was already married, but his wife. An odd compact, it must be confessed!

The prerogatives of rank and favor were here tolerably manifest. The Emperor's corrective rod struck without mercy when young hands were uplifted to supplicate his clemency for an error perhaps venial; but he was all indulgence for arrangements revoltingly scandalous. The Barèges enabled him to proceed to Germany; but he insisted on first seeing me on the road to the place where my physicians ordered me. M. Labbat, physician of Cauterêts, an old friend of my mother, was in charge of me on the journey, and accompanied by my intimate friends—Madame Lallemand and M. de Lamoignon—I accomplished it, lying in my carriage and nearly dying. But I reached Cauterêts, and there, at the waters of Caldas da Raynha in Portugal, scarcely drunk the first glass before I was sensible of my improvement; at the end of a week I ate as heartily as a laborer, and before a fortnight had elapsed was wandering about the mountains at the risk of breaking my

WHILE I was wandering among the lovely valleys of the Pyrenees, whither I had been ordered by my physicians, the plains of Germany were deluged with sanguine with war and her lands visited with disastrous scourges whose aggravated wounds were served with fearful usury for us. Masséna was at the Inn, burning Scharding, and reviving in o cipitately and in confusion among the defiles of the Bohemian mountains; where, incessantly harassed by the swift succeeding strokes of that ponderous club which the hand of Napoleon so efficiently wielded, they could scarcely for ten days recover breath to fly before him who again commanded the ancient ramparts of Vienna to bow down. This campaign, however, was not like that of Austerlitz, crowned with laurels interspersed with flowers: mourning followed in the train of triumph, and every bulletin plunged a thousand families in tears. For Napoleon's puissant voice could still command the soldier to march! and he marched—to die! and he died. The forty-sixth regiment of the line marched from Scharding to Ebensberg, a distance of twenty-six leagues, in five-and-thirty hours.

We frequently received letters from headquarters, and the army was still advancing. Vienna resolved on defense, and sustained a severe bombardment for thirty hours; but the attention of the Aulic Council was directed less to fortifying than provisioning the capital; for, when taken, she furnished supplies sufficient, as one of our inspectors declared, for a whole campaign. The Archduke Charles met Napoleon at the Battle of Essling; and death was rife in both armies; ours lost its bravest chief in Marshal Lannes. The butchery was horrible. The Archduke proclaimed a loss on his own side of 4,300 killed and 12,000 wounded. From this admission of the enemy, generally below the truth, our loss may be estimated.

From Vienna was issued the Imperial Decree for annexing the Roman States to the French Empire, leaving to the Pope the choice of residing at Rome, and a revenue of two millions of francs. The Emperor had long vehemently declaimed against the danger of a sovereignty," etc. Alas! the avenging blow which at last too surely struck him came in a more substantial shape than this impotent Bull.

It is inexplicable, or to be explained only by the dizziness which such stupendous and still extending power produced, that the Emperor, aware of the situation of Spain, should at such a time have courted new difficulties, by violating the domicile of St. Peter, for the futile ambition of appointing Prefects of the Tiber and the Rhine! Policy must not be arrested in its course! True! Neither could that fatality which swept onward to his destruction, when in 1814 an unequal struggle against overwhelming numbers too sadly convinced him how costly was the sacrifice of 400,000 men to the demon of fanaticism in Spain.

Meanwhile the French army in Aragon, thanks to the condition in which Junot had left it, obtained some success. General Suchet, who fully justified Junot's expectations, completely defeated General Blake at Belchite. The ADVENTURE of the second expedition to Portugal happened about the same time; I call it an "adventure," because the facts were perfectly romantic. That gleam of ambition, the undefined shadow of which was thrown across his path by one of his captains, was one of the most extraordinary incidents of Napoleon's reign.

A member of the English Parliament justly observed that it was the policy of the English Government to support, or even to incite the inclinations of Soult—to place in his hand and on his head the attributes of royalty. In the English work of Colonel Napier this important affair is passed over in one line, just declaring that there is no truth in it. The Colonel, I am persuaded, drew his materials from an authentic source; and had he condescended to communicate them they would doubtless Duc d'Abrantès, by my order, declared that the Duke of Braganza had ceased to reign. Repeat the proposition; and if, for the preservation of Portugal, it is necessary to give her a new dynasty, I shall see you with pleasure." This version may be correct, and is plausible, but it should either have been supported by substantial proof. Those, however, who were about the Emperor at Schönbrunn when he arrived and related, with the venom of a serpent, the whole disastrous history of Soult's army, well knew the effect the news produced upon him; he turned pale, was seized with one of those nervous affections to which he was occasionally subject.

Subsequently, in the course of the same day, I spoke of the affair in a tone of raillery which he could not have adopted had he been its instigator. I said, laughing, but with that bitter laugh that comes from embellishing his expressive countenance: "—King of Portugal! Yes, King of Portugal! Nicholas the First. Is not his name Nicholas? Not Nicholas!—it should rather have been Nicodemus! The people have affected to deny this whole scene, but the Emperor could not call Soult Nicholas, when his name was Jean.* Did he really believe the name was Nicholas, or did he merely choose to place it in position with that of Nicodemus? This question I cannot resolve, but I can positively vouch for the verity."

Alas! we had not yet done with that unhappy Emperor; another army was yet to be engulfed in that awful abyss. When accompanying my husband into the evidences of my own senses confirmed the disastrous retreat, which one of my best friends, then Colonel of a cavalry regiment, had painted in colors which made me shudder and weep with grief and indignation. This retreat contrasted well

Grand Vizier. "But I escaped them," said she triumphantly; "the Turks did not even see me." "And how did you manage it?" "I encountered Captain Schiller, who detained me six weeks with him." This famous captain of pandours made little distinction between friends and enemies in affairs of gallantry.

The death of Marshal Lannes created a great impression, not only in the army but throughout Europe. But in France probably this misfortune was less felt than it would have been had it occurred at any other time. The Battle of Essling was one of those fatal occasions in which death strikes with such multiplied and indiscriminate blows that, in the universality of private grief, a public loss, such as that of Marshal Lannes, makes less impression.

The Emperor had been warmly attached to Lannes, but he had also been often offended with him, and now, perhaps, involuntarily showed that his regret was that of the Sovereign for a man of talent, and that as a friend he was little affected. He even jested upon the Battle of Essling, observing that the Austrians had this day met with an ally they had not reckoned upon, and that GENERAL DANUBE had proved himself the best officer of their army. It was to the destruction of the bridges that the Emperor referred; but I knew not why I never could accustom myself to his forced laugh; there was no mirth in it, neither was there anything amusing. I feel even in the recollection of it, as in an unnatural atmosphere, in which I seem to breathe with difficulty, and only recover from the oppression by looking up and contemplating him on the summit of that column, forged from the hostile cannons which he threw so lavishly into the furnace.

Still victory was faithful to our arms. Prince Eugène beat Jellachich at Leoben, a place equally memorable to more authentic information than was generally possessed, because my letters came direct from Germany, and I read no newspaper.

I had regular communications from Junot, who commanded the Saxon and Bavarian troops; but I kept them to myself when they did not agree with the bulletins, as in the case of the Battle of Essling. Prince Eugène's victory over the Archduke John at Raab, in Hungary, is one of the events of this campaign in which the Emperor had the greatest cause to rejoice, but he spoke of it merely as an ordinary affair; its consequences, however, were immense.

Macdonald, who (to the shame, be it spoken, of several marshals who did not very well know to what they owed their bee-besprinkled batons) was not yet reckoned in the list of the great officers of the Empire, took his place among them in recompense of his conduct in this campaign of 1809; as did Marmont, to whose promotion a curious anecdote is attached.

At the formation of the Empire, Marmont received no appointment; Junot was grieved, and so expressed himself to Berthier and Duroc, but found neither of them very well disposed toward his friend. The Emperor had pronounced by his silence, and for Berthier that was sufficient. Duroc had been offended by the assuming manners of Marmont, who, though the most noble, generous, and kind-hearted of men, made himself more enemies by the haughty bearing he adopted than he acquired friends by his excellent qualities. Still, as his manner offered no real offense to anyone, it was childish to be angry about it; and I have often remarked to those who spoke coldly of him for so insufficient a cause, that such testiness was more ridiculous than Marmont's overestimation of his own dignity. In short, he had enemies, and that moment an important evolution, which at present I do not remember, but of the value of which he was fully conscious, and concluded the Emperor would be so likewise, he presented himself before him at the close of the battle to receive the expected meed of approbation. The Emperor regarded him with bent brows, and abruptly passing him, said: "You have manœuverd like an oyster."

The sentence was terrible, and the more so as all those who had had the means of judging of Marmont's conduct during this day knew that he had particularly distinguished himself. He returned to his quarters in despair.

"My friend," said he to his General of Division—Clausel—to whom he was much attached, "I am lost—disgraced! Good heavens! what inconceivable ingratitude! When I have made superhuman exertions in his service—when, by my zeal alone, I have succeeded in bringing up the troops which in all probability decided the fate of the battle—after such a sentence, I have nothing to expect but exile, or at least disgrace." And this man, usually so cold and calm, strode across the room with alarming vehemence; it was not the loss of favor which so affected him—it was the presumed ingratitude of one whom, like Junot, he loved with all the ardor of his heart.

General Clausel knew not what to answer; he was confounded by this apostrophe of Napoleon, but endeavored to console his General by putting the only construction upon it which, in his opinion, the really successful manœuver of Marmont would allow it to bear. "The Emperor," said he, "is seeking to elude his promise; he has some destination for the baton more advantageous to his interests, and you, of whose attachment he is certain,

In the midst of this violent agitation, and the Prince of Neufchâtel came to seek the Duke of Gusa. The Duke looked at General Clausel, him, and after what he had heard, believing to be certain, said to him, with a melancholy and support yourself like a man; you have reproach yourself with—a good conscience is auxiliary; go, then, with confidence.”

General Clausel, who felt that at this moment solations of friendship were due to his General on his return. He was not absent more than half a day, and when he reappeared his usually stern countenance was lighted up with such an exultation of joy and gayety that the General scarcely thought of his right mind. His raised hand displayed a countenance whose voice was so stifled with emotion that he exclaimed: “My friend! my friend! I am a Marshal.”

This fact, like many others which relate to the connection with the Emperor, would serve for comment upon, and might furnish a key to the fate of Marmont’s destiny. No doubt he thought himself very happy in holding that parchment, which was one ray to his glory; but did that moment make up for the many sleepless nights that preceded it, the disappointments he had felt, and the neglect he had not unjustly conceived his merits to have been rewarded. I believe not.

Again, at this period a great portion of France was thrown into mourning by the Battle of Wagram. The news reached me in the Pyrenees, and I own I was almost as proud as of the victory of Austerlitz that Junot was not there. Masséna, Prince of Essling, Oudinot, and Davoût were chiefly distinguished in that battle was perhaps the most dramatic, and the

While the hostile armies were fighting with such fury on the borders of Hungary, Junot commanded a division opposed to Kiemayer; he was in want of troops, which the King of Westphalia had been directed to bring up. With a very accurate foresight, Junot wrote to the King of Wirtemberg to support him. I here transcribe that Prince's answer, not on account of any special interest attaching to it, but as a specimen of the zeal with which at that period the Kings of the Confederation affected to unite in the views of Napoleon:

"MY COUSIN:—I have received your letter from Amberg, on the 12th, and have already written to you from Ellwangen on the 4th, that I expected to be obliged to oppose all my disposable troops to the invasion of the insurgents from the Tyrol and Vorarlberg. You will consequently understand that the same cause, which prevented my sending you the reinforcement you wrote to me at Ellwangen to request, still continuing, and being, moreover, at a distance of forty leagues from you, it would be very difficult to arrive time enough to assist you against an enemy who is within a march and a half of you. According to my official reports, the headquarters of the King of Westphalia are but fourteen leagues distant, consequently he will be in the rear of Kiemayer's corps; I conceive that, under these circumstances, there is little room to apprehend that General's advance to any distance from the frontiers of Bohemia, especially since the brilliant victory of the 5th and 6th,* the more so as the most recent intelligence from Nuremberg makes no mention of his approach. With this, I pray God, my cousin, to take you into his holy and powerful keeping.

"Your good cousin,

"FREDERICK.

"Weimgarten, 15th July, 1809."

I do not rightly know what had happened to the King of Westphalia; but he did not arrive in time—I even believe he did not arrive at all. Junot would not report this to the Emperor; but Napoleon heard of it, and was violently angry with Jérôme. How deeply must the Emperor have suffered sometimes!

Junot was almost immediately afterward invested with the military government of Saxony. He had before been Governor of the Principality of Bayreuth, and commanded the troops of the King of Bavaria; all these kings, more submissive than the feudatories of our kings in the Middle Ages, were obsequious even to the generals of the Emperor. The following will show how the King of Saxony addressed one of them:

* Wagram.

"MY COUSIN:—I have learned with satisfaction, by the letter which you addressed to me on the 17th of this month, that his Imperial and Royal Majesty has confided to you the military government of Saxony. I shall have much pleasure in your arrival here, which will afford me an opportunity of renewing my acquaintance with so justly distinguished a General. Be assured that your high reputation has already secured my esteem, and that I shall be happy to prove it to you by the confidence with which I shall promote all your views for the welfare of the service, and of the common cause, to which I am resolved to devote all my resources. With thanks for the obliging sentiments you express toward me, I pray God, my cousin, to take you into his holy and powerful keeping.

"Your affectionate

"FREDERICK AUGUSTUS.

"DRESDEN, 19th August, 1809."

At length the Emperor made peace with Austria. The treaty was signed by the Duc de Cadore and Prince Metternich, father of the present Chancellor. This peace was a terrible blow to Austria, but she signed it without murmuring; vengeance was not far distant! The Emperor, who only stopped a few days at Munich on his journey, re-entered Paris amid the first burst of joy at the return of peace, yet he might easily perceive a change of sentiment in his capital. The campaign had been so murderous, the victory so obstinately disputed, that France began to consider her laurels too dearly purchased; then, for the first time, a hostile ball found its way to Napoleon's person. It was at Ratisbon; the ball was a spent one, and it struck his heel—but the heel was Napoleon's, and the ball came from the enemy. The whisper arose: WHAT IF THE BALL HAD STRUCK TWO FEET HIGHER? Then the death of Lannes—that of Lasalle by assassination from the hand of a young fanatic. Death thus roaming, under different forms, about the person of the Emperor, seemed, though it dared not touch him, to say: "Take care of thyself!" All these were inauspicious omens.

CHAPTER XIII.

Approaching Divorce—Conversation with the Empress—Her Distress—Fête at the Hôtel de Ville—The Ladies Appointed to Receive the Empress Countermanded—Her Majesty's Sufferings at This Ball—The Emperor and the Queen of Naples—Berthier—The Divorce Pronounced—Affecting Incident—Josephine at Malmaison—The Rhenish Deputation—Mademoiselle Masséna.

ANOTHER interest blended itself with politics, with which it was closely combined: this was the divorce of the Emperor; no one dared speak openly of it, but nevertheless it was a frequent subject of confidential discussion. The drawing-rooms of Paris were then in a singular state of constraint, which men even of thirty years of age cannot now understand; for, as they were of course dismissed to the nursery or to their beds before the hour of assembly, they are not aware that politics were an interdicted subject, except when spoken aside or mysteriously; but so many private interests were bound up in this divorce, that they were too strong for restriction, and it was talked of—in a low voice, it is true—but still it was talked of.

I had an interview with the Empress at Malmaison; I went thither to breakfast by invitation, accompanied by my eldest daughter Josephine, to whom she was much attached. I had sent her a plant from the Pyrenees, and she wished me to see it in the hothouse. But in vain she attempted to employ herself with those objects which pleased her the most; her eyes were frequently suffused with tears; she was pale, and her whole manner showed indisposition.

"It is very cold!" she repeated, drawing her shawl about her; but, alas! it was the chill of grief creeping about her heart, like the cold hand of Death. I looked at her silently, for respect prevented my opening such a subject of conversation. It was my duty to wait till she spoke first, which she soon did. We were in the hothouse; the child running through its galleries of flowers, and the Empress and I following slowly in silence. She suddenly stopped, gathered some leaves of a shrub near her, and, looking at me with a most melancholy expression of countenance, said:

"Do you know that the Queen of Naples is coming?" It was now my turn to look pale, but I answered immediately: "No, madame." "She will be here in a week." Another pause. "And Madame Mère, have you seen her since your return?" "Certainly, madame; I have already been in waiting." Upon this the Empress drew closer to me; she was already very near, and, taking both my hands, said, in a tone of grief which is still present to my mind after an interval of four-and-twenty years: "Madame Junot, I entreat you to tell me all you have heard relating to me. I ask it as an especial favor—you know that they all desire to ruin me, and my Hortense, and my Eugène. Madame Junot, I again entreat as a favor that you will tell me all you know!"

She spoke with the greatest anxiety; her lips trembled, and her hands were damp and cold. In point of fact she was right, for there could be no more direct means of knowing what was passing relative to her than by learning what was said in the house of Madame Mère. But it was indiscreet, perhaps, to ask these questions of me; in the first place, I should not have repeated the most insignificant sentence which I had heard in Madame's drawing-room; in the second, I was quite at ease upon the subject, for since my return from the Pyrenees I had not heard one single word respecting the Empress pronounced by Madame.

I gave her this assurance upon my honor; she looked at me with a doubtful expression: I repeated my assurances, and added that I might positively affirm that since my return I had not heard the word DIVORCE uttered by Madame or the Princess. The strength of mind of the unfortunate wife failed totally on hearing the dreadful word pronounced; she leaned upon my arm and wept bitterly. "Madame Junot," she said, "remember what I say to you this day, here in this hothouse—this place which is now a paradise, but which may soon become a desert to me—remember that this separation will be my death, and it is they who will have killed me!"

She sobbed. My little Josephine, running to her, pulled her by the shawl to show her some flowers she had plucked, for the Empress was so fond of her as even to permit her to gather flowers in her greenhouse. She took her in her arms, and pressed her to her bosom with an almost convulsive emotion. The child appeared frightened; but presently, raising her head, and shaking the forest of light silken curls which clustered round her face, she fixed her large blue eyes upon the agitated countenance of her godmother, and said: "I do not like you to cry." The Empress again embraced her tenderly, and, setting her down, said to me:

"You can have little idea how much I have suffered when anyone of you has brought a child to me! Heaven knows that I am not envious, but in this one case I have felt as if a deadly poison were creeping through my veins when I have looked upon the fresh and rosy cheeks of a beautiful child, the joy of its mother, but, above all, the hope of its father! and I, struck with barrenness, shall be driven in disgrace from the bed of him who has given me a crown! Yet God is my witness that I love him more than my life, and much more than that throne, that crown which he has given me!" The Empress may have appeared more beautiful, but never more attractive, than at that moment. If Napoleon had seen her then, surely he could never have divorced her. Ah! in summing up the misfortunes of this fatal year, that divorce must be added to render them complete.

This conversation, of which I have only reported the principal features, made a deep impression upon me. On my return to Paris an hour afterward, I repeated it to Junot, and I still wept while relating to him that deep but gentle grief, so affecting to the feelings. I also told Junot that the Empress desired to see him at the Tuileries at noon the following day.

It was now the 25th of November, and everything was prepared for celebrating the double anniversary of the Coronation and the Battle of Austerlitz. The city of Paris determined to take the lead in the rejoicings, and Comte Frochot had made the most sumptuous preparations for the entertainment at the Hôtel de Ville. The court of the Hôtel was to be as usual transformed into an immense ballroom, to which the old gallery formed a superb avenue. Though indisposed, I prepared to fulfill my duty, and on the 2d of December arrived amid a general sadness which affected the whole Court. The Emperor himself, while he put on a show of gayety, set an example of constraint,—a misfortune was foreseen, and in truth the separation of Napoleon Bonaparte from Josephine must ever be considered a very great one.

The Emperor had expressed a wish that the ball should commence early, because it was his desire to see everyone, and especially as few COURT dresses as possible. He repeated: "I see them daily at the Tuileries; the city of Paris gives me a fête, and it is the city of Paris I wish to meet." I left home at three o'clock, because I had been told that the Emperor and Empress would dine at the Hôtel de Ville, and, if so, I was to wait upon the Empress.

At the Hôtel de Ville I found everything in the most admirable order, but had not much opportunity of inspecting the preparations, as the rooms were already filled with the ladies invited. I proceeded to the small salon beside the staircase, where I found the ladies assembled whose names had been sent in to me. They were mostly young, pretty, and very elegant, or at least very polite and pleasing. We remained in the salon. I knew that the Queen of Naples had arrived in the morning, but I knew nothing more. Junot, whom I questioned at least ten times, did not know what answer to make; he was in the condition of a man who, having had a very agreeable dream, awakes and wishes to find it reality. I was therefore quite ignorant of any change of plan until M. de Ségur came into the room. Calling me into the recess of one of the windows, which in this ancient building were as deep as a small room, he said in a low voice:

"The face of affairs is changed; your beautiful attendants may take their departure to the upper part of the room, and yourself also, my fair Gouvernante. You have nothing further to do here. The Empress," he continued in a still lower tone, "is to be received by Frochot only. Do you hear what I have been saying?" He had reason to ask the question, for I stood like a statue. "And why this prohibition?" "I know not; or rather I do know, but I do not choose to say." He laughed, but I could not join in the laugh; this strange command sounded in my ears like a bell tolling the knell of the unfortunate Empress.

Napoleon, while he braved public opinion, was always desirous of ascertaining it, and though he did not suffer it to control his proceedings, it had its weight in his decision. He seized the opportunity, therefore, of this popular fête to infuse the idea that the divorce was contemplated; he wished it to be conjectured, to be commented upon in whispers, but not as an authenticated event admitting of no revocation. Such were the impressions which passed rapidly through my mind, and I believe they were correct.

I was returning to my companions to explain to them the necessity of our immediately taking the places reserved for us in the throne room when Junot and M. Frochot entered together. "What can be the matter?" said Frochot, addressing me; "you are perfectly blue; are you cold?" On the contrary, I was burning hot. I explained to them the whole affair, and both were thunderstruck; but at the same moment we heard a movement out of doors, and Junot observed:

"You have not a moment to lose; if you should follow the Empress into the throne room, although you had not gone to meet her, the Emperor will consider it the same thing, and will be angry. You and these ladies must therefore proceed immediately to your places." I know not what Frochot said to them, but they were content, and I was excused interfering. We went up to the throne room, and had scarcely taken our seats before the drums announced the Empress's arrival. Never shall I forget her appearance on that day, or the costume which so admirably became her. Her countenance, always gentle, was on that occasion veiled in grief. She had not expected the solitude she had encountered on the staircase. Junot, however, met her there at the risk of displeasing the Emperor, and so, by his contrivance, did some ladies, who did not know for what purpose they were there.

The Empress was not deceived, and when she entered the Grand Salon, when she approached that throne upon which she was about to take her station in the presence of the great city, perhaps for the last time, her legs failed her, her eyes filled with tears, and she seated herself immediately. No wonder that she did so, for after passing through that long gallery and all the preceding apartments in the state of mind which everything since she alighted from her carriage was calculated to produce, clothed in smiles! Oh, the tortures of a crown! She was followed by Madame de La Rochefoucauld, her lady of honor, and two ladies of the Palace, whose names I do not remember, for on that day I saw only her.

I sought her eyes the moment she sat down, and would willingly have fallen at her feet to tell her how much I felt for her. She understood, and cast upon me a look of the deepest melancholy, which, perhaps, her eyes had ever expressed since that crown, now robbed of its roses, had been placed upon her head. Junot was beside her. "Were you not afraid?" I afterward asked him, "of the wrath of Jupiter?" "No," said he, with an air of gloom that affected me; "I never fear him when he is wrong."

The drums beat again, and in a few moments the Emperor appeared, advancing with a hasty step, and accompanied by the Queen of Naples and the King of Westphalia. I have already said that a change of sentiment respecting the Emperor pervaded the capital. He had conquered, indeed, a hostile monarchy, but tottering and mutilated as that monarchy was, it had risen against us with such tremendous might that France was covered with emblems of mourning. His laurels began to be less verdant. Again, the establishment of eight fortresses which would serve as State prisons was talked of; a divorce was in agitation; Josephine was beloved, and the good citizens of Paris murmured at the proposition. The Emperor's countenance as he entered the Hôtel de Ville very plainly expressed that he was aware of all this.

The Queen of Naples, whose gracious and condescending smile seemed to demand from the Parisians a welcome on her return among them, spoke to everyone with extreme affability. The Emperor, desirous also of being agreeable, walked around the ballroom, conversing, asking questions, and followed by Berthier, who, dangling after his master, filled the office of Chamberlain rather than of Grand Constable. A slight circumstance, in which Berthier was an actor in the course of that evening, contributed to give me pain. The Emperor rose from his chair of State and descended the steps of his throne to make a last visit to the ballroom; at the moment of rising I saw him incline toward the Empress, probably to desire she would follow his example. He stood up first and Berthier, in his hurry to follow him, entangled his foot in the Empress's train as she rose. He narrowly escaped falling himself, and though he caused the Empress to stumble, hurried on to join the Emperor without one word of apology.

Probably Berthier had no intention of being disrespectful to her, but it was carelessly done. He was in the secret, and knew the drama that was about to be enacted; certainly he would have had more consideration a year earlier. The Empress stood for a moment with remarkable dignity, smiling at his awkwardness, while her eyes filled with tears and her lips trembled. Though the weather was bitterly cold the heat in these thronged apartments was excessive. The Emperor made the tour of the Grand Gallery, talking to persons on the one side, while the Empress took the other.

At length the divorce was announced*—and, though expected, the effect which the news produced in France

*“The divorce was, unquestionably, a reverse of fortune for Josephine, which she felt most severely, but she bore it with magnanimity. The particulars of the interview between her and the Emperor are very affecting. When Napoleon mentioned the necessity of a divorce he approached Josephine, gazed on her for a while, and then pronounced the following words: ‘Josephine, my excellent Josephine, thou knowest if I have loved thee! To thee, to thee alone do I owe the only moments of happiness which I have enjoyed in this world. Josephine! my destiny overmasters my will. My dearest affections must be silent before the interests of France.’ ‘Say no more,’ she replied, ‘I was prepared for this; but the blow is not less mortal!’

“Josephine, on hearing from his own lips the determination of the Emperor, fainted and was carried to her chamber.

“On the 15th of December, 1809, the Imperial Council of State was convened, and for the first time officially informed of the intended separation. On the morrow the whole of the family assembled in the Grand Salon at the Tuileries. All were in Court costume. Napoleon's was the only countenance which betrayed emotion, but ill-concealed by the drooping plumes of his hat of ceremony. He stood motionless as a statue, his arms crossed upon his breast; the members of his family were seated around, showing in their expression less of sympathy with so painful a scene than of satisfaction that one was to be removed who had so long held influence, gently exerted as it had been, over their brother. In the center of the apartment was placed an armchair, and before it a small table with a writing apparatus of gold.

“All eyes were directed to that spot, when a door opened, and Josephine, pale but calm, appeared, leaning on the arm of her daughbaffles description—among the populace and the middle class especially. It was like their guardian genius deserting them. The upper class were for the most part ter, whose fast-falling tears showed that she had not attained the resignation of her mother. Both were dressed in the simplest manner. Josephine's dress of white muslin exhibited not a single ornament. She moved slowly and with wonted grace to the seat prepared for her, and there listened to the reading of the act of separation. Behind her chair stood Hortense, whose sobs were audible, and a little further on toward Napoleon, Eugène, trembling as if incapable of supporting himself. Josephine heard in composure the words that placed an eternal barrier between her and greatness, between her and the object of her affection.

"This painful duty over, the Empress appeared to acquire a degree of resolution from the very effort to resign with dignity the formality of power forever. Pressing, for an instant, the handkerchief to her eyes, she rose, and, with a voice which but for a slight tremor might have been called firm, pronounced the oath of acceptance; then sitting down, she took the pen from the hand of the Comte Regnault Saint Jean d'Angely, and signed it. The mother and daughter now left the salon followed by Eugène, who appeared to suffer most severely of the three.

"The sad interest of the day had not yet been exhausted. Josephine had remained unseen, sorrowing in her chamber, till Napoleon's usual hour of retiring to rest. He had just placed himself in bed, silent and melancholy, when suddenly the private door opened and the Empress appeared, her hair in disorder, and her face swollen with weeping. Advancing with a tottering step, she stood, as if irresolute, near the bed, clasped her hands, and burst into an agony of tears. Delicacy seemed at first to have arrested her progress, but forgetting everything in the fullness of her grief, she threw herself on the bed, clasped her husband's neck, and sobbed as if her heart would break. Napoleon also wept while he endeavored to console her, and they remained a few minutes locked in each other's arms, silently mingling their tears, until the Emperor, perceiving Constant in the room, dismissed him to the antechamber. After an interview of about an hour, Josephine parted forever from the man whom she so long and so tenderly loved.

"On seeing the Empress retire, which she did in tears, the attendant entered to remove the lights, and found the chamber silent as death, and Napoleon sunk among the bedclothes so as to be invisible. The next morning he still showed the marks of suffering. At eleven, Josephine was to bid adieu to the Tuileries, never to enter the Palace more. The whole household assembled on the stairs in order to obtain a last look of a mistress whom they loved, and who carried with her into exile the hearts of all who had enjoyed the happiness of access to her presence. Josephine was veiled from head to foot, and entering a close carriage with six horses, rapidly drove away, without casting one look backward on the scene of past greatness and departed happiness."—Memes's "Memoirs of the Empress Josephine," p. 337.

indifferent, but still there reigned even here a sentiment of sympathetic melancholy; the ladies of the Court, whose life of ceremony is apt to deaden the affections, were actuated at least by their personal interests, and did not know how these might be affected by the newcomer. Already Josephine's goodness was regretted; her kindness and indulgence none can ever attempt to deny; the only objection to be made against her in this respect being the want of discrimination in her goodness and patronage. The effect of all these varying shades of feeling, whether of affection or self-interest, was to produce a certain degree of stupor in society. I was profoundly afflicted, and went the very next day to Malmaison.

One incident in particular gave a still more dramatic effect to the melancholy close of a career so distinguished by the favors of fortune. Prince Eugène, whose affection for his mother is well known, being at the time in Paris, found himself necessitated by his office of Arch-chancellor of State to carry to the Senate the message which announced his mother's divorce. "The tears of the Emperor," said that noble young man, "do honor to my mother." And his own, which flowed profusely through this dreadful day, were a consolation in the midst of her sufferings.

The Empress received at Malmaison all who chose to pay their respects to her. The drawing-room, the billiard-room, and the gallery were full of company. The Empress never appeared to greater advantage. She sat at the right of the chimney, beneath Girodet's fine picture, simply dressed, with a large green capote upon her head, which served to conceal her tears, which would flow whenever anyone came who particularly reminded her of the happy hours of Malmaison and the Consulate. It was impossible to see without emotion the grief which marked her countenance. She raised her eyes to everyone who approached, even smiled at them; but if the visitor was one of her old associates the tears immediately stole down her cheeks, but quietly and without any of those contractions of the features which make weeping inimical to beauty. No doubt Josephine's despair must have been painful to the Emperor; whether he could have resisted her mute expression of mental agony I know not.

I went again to Malmaison a few days afterward with my little Josephine, whom her godmother had desired me to bring; this time, as I was alone with her, she did not scruple to open all the sorrows of her heart, and she spoke of her grief with an energy of truth quite distressing. She regretted all that she had lost; but it is justice to say that far above all she regretted the Emperor. The attentions of her children in those days of suffering were admirable.

At this time of painful feeling to the Emperor—for he loved Josephine—Napoleon received visits from the whole Rhenish Confederation; the King of Saxony, the King and Queen of Bavaria, the King of Wirtemberg; all, in short, came to Paris to make him a visit, which would scarcely admit of more than one construction—for not only was the divorce in process, but the official authorities had pronounced the marriage void.

The imperial divorce produced some terrible disputes between Cardinal Maury and myself. It had long been the desire, I will not say of his heart, for his heart had no concern with the matter, but of his reason, or rather his ambition; wherefore, I never could imagine. In the whole Court besides, I will undertake to say, though the Empress's partialities, more or less ill founded, and her too extensive good nature, may have afforded ground for some quarrel or complaint, no individual was to be found who wished her removal. On the contrary, regret, when the event did take place, was universal. I did not attempt to conceal mine, though my duty frequently led me to the only place where no such regret was felt, for the family of the Emperor must be excepted from the remark I have just made; there it was viewed with unmixed satisfaction.

Cardinal Maury, as everyone knows, spoke loud and decisively; one day after I had answered him in an undertone as long as possible, I began to grow angry also, for he averred that we should be but too happy if Russia would send us one of her Grand-Duchesses—at the same time that a report was current of the Empress Mother having declared that she would prefer throwing her daughter into the Neva to giving her to Napoleon. I thought it ridiculous to cringe, and go begging, cap in hand, for what might be had at home, and would be given with gratitude; and I expressed this opinion to the Cardinal.

"All that is very well," said he; "but how will you find what we want in France?"

"Close beside you." He looked incredulous. "Let the Emperor," said I, "marry Mademoiselle Masséna; he would have a young wife, pretty, blooming, and perfectly well brought up; he would recompense the glorious services of a veteran soldier; he would unite the army to himself by indissoluble ties; and he would be under no obligations to those kings whom he has three times dethroned, and who will still believe that they do him a favor in giving him a wife — educated in hatred to his name and ours."

When I held this argument, Mademoiselle Masséna was still free: my reasoning was good; would to Heaven the Emperor had followed it in all points! The Cardinal repeated it to him one day; he listened very attentively to the end, and then replied:

"What can Madame Junot mean by meddling with such questions? Recommend her to take care that she do not burn her fingers."

The Cardinal was not a man to give up a subject he had once broached. But the Emperor assumed a serious tone, and said:

"The thing is impossible."

I KNOW not whether this unlucky divorce influenced our tempers, but Paris was never so dull as at that moment—amid the finest fêtes the Empire witnessed, except those of the marriage and the coronation. All those kings who encumbered the avenues of the Palace froze our spirits, without inspiring the distant respect which should be the attribute of royalty. In our ill humor we found fault with all of them. The Court was disunited; there was no central point of union. In vain the Queen of Naples lodged in the Tuileries; the Household of her brother did not like her; and though pre-eminent as flatterers, we make but sorry hypocrites. Queen Hortense was really loved; all was freedom in her society; she set everyone at ease. Music, conversation, drawing, billiards, whatever each person liked best; in short, everyone was amused—which never happened under the auspices of the Queen of Naples, except on occasion of a ball, and except, indeed, when she sang duets with the Grand-Duke of Wurtzburg.

Never in my life have I heard anything so ridiculous as the combination of their voices; neither of them had the smallest notion of diffidence, nor the smallest idea of singing; yet they sang on, both together, as if they really had voices! They were princely voices at best. It was said of La Forest, one of the opera singers, that he must have a wooden voice; this would not have been ill applied to the royal duettists. Oh! those concerts of her Imperial Highness the Princess were odd affairs; yet she had some ladies in her Household who might have taught her what good music was. I have often, for example, wondered how it happened that Madame Lambert did not belong to the establishment of Queen Hortense, where her talents for music and painting, and her love of the arts, would have been justly appreciated.

All the Crowned Heads, Majesties and Highnesses assembled at Paris at the commencement of the year 1810 paid their respects to the ex-Empress at Malmaison, and while consolatory, as indicating the Emperor's will that she should be respected as the wife of his choice, yet these visits were oppressive to her—such, at least, they appeared to me to be. In my visits to Malmaison, the Queen of Naples was always the subject of our conversations. Her conduct since her return to Paris evinced a great desire to please; she made superb presents to all the ladies of the Court. My daughters, though young children, received from her each a suit of coral ornaments, one of which, wrought in relief, was very beautiful. It was in this visit that she presented to the Emperor the well-known superb set of chessmen, in Vesuvian lava and coral.

The carnival approached; the Emperor commanded that it should be gay and brilliant; the authorities of Paris prepared to obey the Imperial mandate, and ball succeeded ball without intermission. But how different was the winter from its predecessor! Mourning was universal, and everyone entered into society to divert the feelings from melancholy retrospection. Nothing was real, and no pleasing remembrances remain of the forced festivities of this spring; almost everyone with whom I have conversed upon the subject agrees in the same recollection of it.

While Napoleon was procuring at Paris the dissolution of his marriage, his affairs went on badly at the Court of Rome. He found there a powerful antagonist in Lucien, who, grateful for the asylum which the Pope had nobly granted him, was indignant at seeing him despoiled of his possessions by the Emperor. He endeavored to infuse a new vigor in the councils of the Vatican. For several months the correspondence between the Cabinet of the Tuileries and that of Rome was active and important; its object was to refuse all further concession an Imperial decree was launched from Vienna, commanding the Pope to descend from St. Peter's chair—for to command him to surrender the Roman territory was much the same thing—Cardinal Consalvi, stimulated by Lucien, wrote under his dictation a letter calculated to astonish the Emperor.

Without speaking of the supremacy of the Court of Rome, which Lucien no more wished than Napoleon to re-establish in France, it asserted with justice that the Pope should not be despoiled of his own dominions. But all this resistance had no effect: the States of the Church were united to the French Empire, and the situation of the Pope became critical.

Murat, then at Naples, transmitted to General Radet at Rome Napoleon's orders for the removal of the Pope to France; and on the 5th of July, 1809, the General called upon his Holiness to obey the Emperor's commands. The Pope replied that his double dignity of Sovereign and Chief of the Church placed him beyond the jurisdiction of the French Emperor. "His predecessors," said he to the Envoy, "have saved mine, but this gives him no claim, except on my gratitude." He shut himself up in the Quirinal, and, clothed in all the Pontifical ornaments, seated himself in a chair of state, peaceably to await the coming of General Radet.

The French functionary presented himself in the middle of the night at the principal door of the Palace, and, finding it closed, forced his way into the apartments of the Sovereign Pontiff by a window on the ground floor, took possession of his person, compelled him to enter a carriage, and instantly drove off on the road to Grenoble, according to his orders.

Passing the next morning through Viterbo, Radet perceived an alarming degree of agitation in the popular mind; he hurried the postilions through the necessary operation of changing horses, and hearing on all sides cries which threatened an interruption to his important mission, he called out: "On your knees! the Holy Father is about to give you his blessing."

The people prostrated themselves in an instant, and when all their faces were in the dust, Radet, himself violently applying the whip to the horses, drove off with the rapidity of an arrow, and without the assistance of the postilions, leaving the inhabitants of Viterbo to vent, in harmless maledictions, that rage against us which in another minute would have probably exhibited itself in a more dangerous manner.

Pius VII. remained but a short time at Grenoble; he was soon transferred by the Emperor's orders to Savona, where, kept a close prisoner, almost in sight of his jailers, he was only allowed the liberty of performing mass. General Miollis arrived at Rome to take the command of the city. Lucien then found himself in a strange position. From the commencement of his exile the fine arts, literature, and the education of his children had formed his sole occupations and amusements. The Mæcenas of every man of talent in Rome, he was adored by the artists, whom he employed and understood, for Lucien was never moderately beloved; he was a being of superior worth!

Immediately on the departure of the Holy Father he retired to Tusculum, where he superintended his excavations, and where General Miollis watched him with an inquisitory intrusiveness which Lucien soon found intolerable. With no other title than that of the proscribed brother of the Emperor, for his exclusion from the order of succession threw him, as it were, out of the Family Circle, seeing the Imperial authority crossing the Alps and Apennines to seek him in his studious retreat in the bosom of his numerous family, he determined to quit Europe, and wrote to the Duc de Rovigo, then Minister of Police, to obtain passports for the United States of America.

The Emperor was aware of the demand, without doubt; but he did not appear in the affair, and the answer of the Duc de Rovigo was the transmission of the passports, sanctioning Lucien's expatriation. He then wrote to Naples, requesting Murat to send him an American vessel, released from all embargo. Murat sent the vessel with the most gracious promptitude: Lucien, it seems, frightened them all!

The American ship soon arrived at Civita Vecchia. The entire gallery of Lucien and all the treasures he had found in his researches at Tusculum were carefully packed up under the inspection of M. de Châtillon, who superintended the department of the arts in Lucien's household. But the cases were not all put on board; the greater part was left with Torlonia, the chief banker of Rome. Lucien carried with him all his numerous family portraits, together with that of Pius VII. "He has been a hospitable friend to me," said he; "I must not forget him." At length, in the month of August, 1810, the exiled family quitted Civita Vecchia. It was truly a singular spectacle to see the brother of Napoleon abandoning Europe to seek an asylum in the New World, carrying thither a heart devotedly French and a purely patriotic spirit.

The captain set sail in spite of contrary winds, but had not long cleared the coast before a tremendous storm arose which threatened the ship with utter destruction. Lucien, always possessing the calmness of true courage, required the Captain to put into the port of Cagliari, which they were approaching. The Princess and children were ill, assistance and repose were therefore necessary, and Lucien had letters from the Pope recommending him to the protection of the Sovereigns on whose territories he might chance to touch in his exile.

On reaching Cagliari, M. de Châtillon landed, and carried to the Sardinian Minister a certificate of the illness of Lucien's family, requesting permission for him to land for the purpose of recovery. This affair, which if it had concerned a French family of unknown name would have been settled without difficulty, became strangely complicated by the name of Lucien Bonaparte. The Sardinian Minister humbly replied that such questions concerned Mr. Hill, the British envoy, and that to him alone its decision belonged. In vain M. de Châtillon declined the authority of England; Mr. Hill decreed that M. Lucien Bonaparte, the American vessel, and all that it contained, should be captured in the port at Cagliari.

Lucien turned pale on hearing this decision, and exclaimed, with truly French feeling: "I will not submit to it!" That heart of iron and fire, susceptible also of all the tender emotions, swelled with unutterable grief and indignation as he cast his eyes on his proscribed family and felt that he ought to sway a scepter for their protection. Notwithstanding the illness of his wife and children, he would not permit them to land, and thus passed fourteen days—the most distressing, perhaps, of his life. “We must go,” he said at length, “and let us see if they will dare to execute their threat.”

The American ship sailed out of the port; the two English frigates, seeing its preparations, had stood out the preceding evening; and scarcely had the American advanced a mile, before one of the frigates, the “Pomona,” Captain Barry, fired a shot, and commanded the captain to lay to. The American was only a merchant ship, but the captain’s spirit revolted from thus surrendering a passenger who had intrusted his person and family to his care. “I will not bring to,” said he to his lieutenant.

Captain Barry, receiving no answer, launched his boat, and came himself with two officers alongside the American ship, which he knew to be incapable of defense. The captain, however, intended to defend himself; on perceiving the English captain in his boat he waited till he was within pistol shot, and then would have fired if Lucien had not suddenly given him a smart blow on the arm which compelled him to drop the pistol. With much difficulty he was persuaded to surrender, and the English captain announced to his prisoners that he should convey them to Malta. Captain Barry was then, what he probably still is, if the cannon, sword, and tempest have spared his life so long, that perfectly agreeable character which is natural to an English gentleman; for I may truly affirm that in all my intercourse with the various nations of Europe I have nowhere found individuals so perfectly pleasing and polite in language, manners, and habits as really well-bred Englishmen.

In the interval between their capture and their arrival at Malta he paid the family every attention that kindness and respect could suggest, and a voyage in the Mediterranean permit. On reaching Malta they were conducted to the “Lazaretto”; Lucien solicited permission to remove his wife and children, but was refused by the Governor, General Oakes, with an obstinacy worthy of Saint Helena. It would seem that the British Government prides itself in being represented by men capable of every act of cruelty! The object of this policy I cannot understand.

Lucien was condemned to three days' quarantine, and this useless vexation over, was permitted to take up his residence in the Fort Ricasoli, where he found only damp walls, without an article of furniture, and was obliged at his own expense to procure even chairs and bedding from the town of Valetta. Even the naval officers were indignant at such unworthy treatment; and Lucien, however unwilling to complain, felt it due to the name of a Frenchman to submit his wrongs to the British Government. Its answer arrived at length, ordering that the prisoner should be removed to the castle of Saint Anthony, the residence of the Grand Master in the proud days of the Order, and treated with the utmost consideration, until it was determined in what manner he should be finally disposed of.

In this Gothic castle, which his elevated mind led him to teach his children rather to consider as a retreat than a prison, he and Madame Lucien employed themselves in protecting their young family from ennui, and in so doing, defended themselves also from its attacks. Surrounded by a locality full of romance, where every tower had its tale, and every stone seemed the memento of some illustrious name, Lucien compelled new traditions to take their place beside the old, and consoled his wounded spirit by a closer acquaintance with the Muses; here he proceeded with his poem of "Charlemagne"—venting the grief of exile in words of harmony.

Toward the close of the year Captain Warren arrived in the frigate, the "President," to convey Lucien and his family to England. He requested as a favor that he might be allowed to sail for England accompanied by M. de Châtillon, and to leave his wife and children till the spring, hoping that a personal application to the Prince Regent would have the effect of restoring the liberty of which he had been illegally deprived. But again he met with a refusal; in vain he urged the natural fears of a husband and a father in committing the safety of his tender charges to the mercy of the elements at so inclement a season. "I have my orders," was still the reply of Captain Warren.

Everything on board the frigate was arranged with attention to their comfort, and the conduct of the officers was respectful and accommodating; but the cold and haughty character of Captain Warren increased the disagreeableness of a six weeks' voyage in the midst of winter and dreadful weather. Its tediousness was caused by the great round they were compelled to make to avoid the coast of France, Captain Warren's orders being peremptory to keep out to sea, perfectly armed, and on no account to surrender his prisoner. They at length reached the harbor of Plymouth in frightful weather; here again he encountered inhospitality: the ship was not permitted to anchor, and rode out through the night in so tremendous a storm that the danger of being wrecked on the rocks of that dangerous coast was every moment imminent.

How grateful was Lucien for the protection of Heaven, when, after that tremendous night, he landed in safety with his children at Plymouth! He here found Mr. Mackenzie, a State messenger, authorized to offer him an asylum and the rites of hospitality in their most extended sense. Lucien, with his usual dignity, returned his thanks with reserve and coldness, and continued: "I have been made prisoner illegally, and I protest against everything which myself and family have undergone since we quitted the port of Cagliari; I demand to be allowed to pursue my journey, and beyond that, sir, I refuse all the offers of your Government, for I can accept nothing from a nation which is the enemy of mine, nor from a Government that makes war upon my brother." "Then," replied Mr. Mackenzie, coldly but politely, "I am obliged to fulfill my commission."

The following day Lucien was conducted to Ludlow Castle, and placed under the charge of Lord Powis, Lord-Lieutenant of the county of Salop, and father-in-law of the Duke of Northumberland. He was recommended by all means to induce his prisoner to put himself in direct opposition to the Emperor. His constant refusal produced a more rigorous captivity, and he was confined to a circuit of two miles round Ludlow, the antique and gloomy castle of which was of sinister omen, having been the habitation of the unfortunate children of King Edward. He obtained, however, at length, permission to quit Ludlow, and to take up his residence at Thorngrove, on the road to Worcester, a charming mansion, which he had himself purchased of M. Lamotte, a Frenchman established in England, for eighteen thousand guineas; it is surrounded by a park, inclosing a garden and hot-house, and possesses all those exterior and interior comforts so peculiar to the home of an English family.

Having tastefully completed the arrangements of his new habitation and hung the drawing-room with his family portraits, he laid down rules for the domestic life he intended to lead here. His love for the arts and sciences gained strength in this friendly retreat; he had always been fond of astronomy, and now pursued it with ardor. He visited Herschel at Slough, and purchased one of his famous telescopes for fifty thousand francs; he then built an observatory, calculated ephemerides, and announced a new planet in the Milky Way; he was not mistaken, and has the prior right to the merit of this discovery. Thorngrove became a Lyceum. Lucien composed several comedies, which were acted in his domestic theater, also the tragedy of "Clotaire," a work of real merit, which was performed before an audience of more than two hundred persons, nearly all chosen from the middle classes of the neighborhood; for, considering the Ministry as his enemies, he would have no intercourse with Tories.

As the author, he chose to judge of the effect of the piece, and would therefore take no part in it; M. de Châtillon performed Clotaire; Madame Lucien played well in the becoming costume of Clotilde; the two children were represented by her young sons, Charles and Paul; the wife of Clotaire by Lucien's eldest daughter, Charlotte, now Princess Gabrielli; and Sigerie, the confidant of Clotaire, by Christina, also his daughter by his first wife [and now married to Lord Dudley Stuart], who, in the scarcity of actors in the family, was obliged to take a male part. It seems to me that Ludlow, the first prison of Edward's children, must have suggested to Lucien the plot of this tragedy.

The drama, however, was not the only subject of his muse during his residence at Thorngrove; here he completed his poem of "Charlemagne," and produced that of "Cirneide." The Princess of Canino also, stimulated by his example, composed a poem on the subject of "Bathilde, Queen of the Franks"; it is well sustained, in six cantos, with verses of ten syllables in varied rhymes. I shall have occasion to speak of it again with relation to an extraordinary fact, of which I do not believe the Emperor capable, but which proves, at least, the extent to which a base inclination to flatter his supposed wishes was carried by those around him. M. de Châtillon was employed at the same time upon a small poem called the "Odyssey of Lucien; or, The Exile." He also sketched forty-eight designs for the illustration of "Charlemagne" and "Bathilde"; these sketches, which must necessarily embody the intentions of the authors, as they were drawn under their superintendence, were being engraved in London by the celebrated Heath, when the Restoration interrupted the series.

Every member of the family at Thorngrove was actively engaged. Every Sunday the work of the week was brought forward; an examination took place, also a competition for prizes; the day was closed with a concert, in which the young ladies sang, M. de Châtillon played the violin, and Father Maurice the piano.

Thus did Lucien embellish his retreat with everything that could tend to make time pass pleasantly, living like a really wise man, without any false pretensions to philosophy. His style of life excited much curiosity in England, but he studiously retired from observation with a calm and natural dignity which inspired general respect. The Duke of Norfolk, desirous of becoming acquainted with him, visited Thorngrove, where, cheerful, agreeable, and witty, he attracted the affections of the whole family during the three days he passed with them.

Junot. Ordered to Spain—I Accompany Him—Our Journey—Counter Order to Proceed to Burgos—French Justice—My Fright—The Horrors of War—Vittoria—Letters from My Children—Rumored Death of Durosnel—News Conveyed to Madame Durosnel—Lavalette Inexpert at Dissimulation—Dreadful Accident at Prince Schwartzberg's Ball—The Temporary Ballroom—The Empress's Courage—The Emperor's Exertions to Render Assistance to the Sufferers—Absence of the Engines—Princess Schwartzberg Burned to Death—Escape of Prince Eugène and the Vice-Queen—Death of the Princess de la Leyen—Madame de Br—x—General Solignac—Cleansing of Burgos—Cruelty of the Soldiers at Arguano—The Spaniard's Sacrifice.

EARLY in the year 1810 Junot received orders to proceed to Spain and there take the command of the 8th division. This new proof of the Emperor's confidence gave him no pleasure, for in this profitless Spanish war all the sentiments of humanity had been outraged, the glory of our arms had vanished, and victory itself was unavailing. But it was necessary to obey. I followed him, and my will alone determined me to take this step, to which the Emperor reluctantly consented.

Junot's instructions were to reach Bayonne with as little delay as possible; and we set out on the 2d of February, when the cold was excessive. "You cannot accompany me," said he. "Let us set out," I replied; "you will find my strength greater than you expect."

I equipped myself in a gray cashmere riding habit, a well-furred Polonese cap, having first had my hair cropped, fur boots, and a large traveling cloak; and thus defended I stepped at midnight into a close calèche with Junot, and set out for Bayonne.

We traveled without stopping from Paris to Bordeaux, and there halted for a few hours to enable me to visit my aged and venerable friend Madame de Caseaux, who with her daughter had but a few years before enjoyed one of the largest fortunes in France; but it was rapidly vanishing through the trickery of relations; and finding it nearly dissipated, Laura, resolving to preserve her mother's gray hairs from the privations of poverty, had recently came up to Paris to solicit justice. Junot and I received her as a sister, and promoted her suit by every means at our command; but as its object was not yet accomplished we left her the possession of our Hôtel.

Twenty hours more conducted us to Bayonne, and these were partly employed in reading the foreign newspapers given to us by our banker at Bordeaux, and which we examined with avidity, well aware that our own had long published only what suited the Government. The English papers were the most interesting, and already dilated on the approaching marriage of Napoleon, though the Diocesan Court had only annulled his union with Josephine on the 18th of January, which sentence was afterward confirmed by the Metropolitan Court.

During the same journey Junot corrected my opinion of Marshal Soult, assuring me that so superior were his talents that it was a matter of astonishment to him that the Emperor had not intrusted to him the chief command in all Spain.

"But he could not command Marshal Jourdan," said I, with the prejudice of my childhood concerning precedence.

Junot laughed heartily. "Marshal Jourdan!" said he at length; "my dear little Laura, do not you know why he is a Marshal?"

I stared in amazement. "Why, because——"

"You know nothing about it—is not that the truth? Well, neither do I, for the whole army has equal pretensions to the distinction. But Soult! the deuce! he is quite another person! He is, after the Emperor, the most intelligent and capable of all the French generals."

Yet how perversely are men's sentiments and actions sometimes at variance. When Soult was appointed Major General in Spain in the place of Jourdan, Junot, like the others, refused obedience; and I shall presently have occasion to show the deplorable inconvenience resulting from such insubordination among the French chiefs.

Overcome with fatigue on our arrival at Bayonne, I merely disencumbered myself of my riding habit, and, throwing myself on a bed, was presently in a sound sleep, from which Junot awoke me with an embrace and ADIEU.

Starting up. I rubbed my eyes.

"What do you mean? ADIEU!"

"Yes, I here find new orders to enter Spain immediately, and to reach Burgos on the 15th; I have not, therefore, a minute to lose. You will rejoin me by the first convoy, and I shall leave you an escort of five hundred men of the battalion of Neufchâtel—men that you may depend on—so be satisfied."

"Not I, indeed. I did not leave home to travel with a convoy, or to attend to my personal conveniences. I shall go with you."

Junot looked at me with mingled astonishment and emotion.

"You will go with me? and without rest?"

"This instant."

"I will defer my departure, then; lie down again, and sleep for a few hours."

"Not a single minute."

"Laura, you are unwell."

"No, I am quite well."

"Your hand is burning. I will not allow you to resume your journey yet—the vanguard of the first division commenced its march yesterday: a few hours' delay, therefore, will be no breach of duty. We will set out at noon."

"I assure you opposition only annoys me: let us set off this instant: desire M. Prevôt to have my horse saddled, and remember that I never intend to cause you a moment's delay: let that be understood between us once for all—will you?"

I extended my hand to him as to a brother-in-arms; and, indeed, the adventurous life on which I had entered placed me on a level with that sex whose courage I was compelled to assume. I had maturely weighed the enterprise and prepared myself for all emergencies. Junot was therefore obliged to conform, and we departed, traveling alternately in the calèche, on horseback, or on foot, through the Spanish-looking streets of Bayonne, with its smiling environs, inhabited by the happiest peasantry and most beautiful girls in France; the sandy solitudes of Saint Jean de Luz, where we first inhaled the soft and aromatic breezes of the South; Alegria, the home of the Mendizabals; Villa Franca; Villa Real, with its pretty churches; the picturesque valley of Bergara, with its Gothic chapel; Mondragon, its sunny vale, and its mines and mills of bloodstone; and the Salvator Rosa scenery of Salinas.

But how deplorably were all these landscapes disfigured by the horrors of war, an evidence of which presented itself to me one evening, the fourth of my travels in Spain, under a form that I can never forget. Quite worn out with walking, I proposed entering the calèche, which always followed us; Junot consented, and fell asleep the moment we were comfortably seated.

Too much fatigued to follow his example, I sought refreshment at the carriage window, gazing on the steep and winding road by which we were climbing the side of a mountain, composed chiefly of brownish granite, almost covered with moss, but here and there diversified by groups of stunted oaks; my thoughts, which wandered far from these surrounding objects, were recalled by my eyes resting, through the increasing gloom of the twilight, upon the strange appearance of an isolated oak at a short distance before us, the branches of which seemed to be broken and swinging heavily in the wind. While I was seeking my eyeglass to see it more distinctly we reached the spot, and at the moment I stretched my head out of the window my forehead encountered the touch of a human foot!—the foot of a bloody and horribly mangled corpse, suspended from the tree: a specimen of French justice! nor was it alone: beside it hung three of its former comrades!

The shriek that escaped me in the first moment of horror awakened Junot and startled the sleepy postilion; the latter instantly stopped his mules, leaving us stationary close to this spectacle, more terrific than imagination can conceive, and on which, in spite of myself, my eyes would instinctively rest! Oh, how long afterward did that fearful scene haunt my dreams! The ghastly countenances, still expressive of demoniac rage, the torn and clotted limbs, at which even the mules, pinching their ears and dilating their nostrils, recoiled with an audible demonstration of terror, made a painful and lasting impression.

“Will you proceed?” cried Junot to the postilion in a voice of thunder, at the same time smartly striking the nearest mule with his cane. The calèche started with the celerity of lightning.

"What is the matter with you? It is a necessary evil," said Junot to me, quietly reseating himself in the corner of the carriage, and resuming his nap.

But, oh! I could not sleep; for many a night the balmy soother of our fears and griefs was scared from my pillow.

"Child," said Junot, when I afterward reproached him with his indifference, "you should not have faced war if you cannot endure such sights. What is it you have seen? four rascals who had probably massacred some sleeping Frenchmen, or some woman, old man, or even child! Take my advice, and reserve your sensibility for other misfortunes."

A few days afterward, amid the tufts of thyme and lavender, and the box and juniper bushes growing among the rocks of Pancorvo, our soldiers discovered the fragments of a body which the assassins had cut to pieces, and on one of the mutilated arms recognized the vestige of a French uniform! Ah! Junot was right; the misfortunes of this war were terrible indeed!

Vittoria would be anywhere remarked as a pretty little town, but its architecture appears to particular advantage in Spain, differing as it does from the prevalent style of the country. The square is large and airy, and the whole aspect of the place indicative of industry and activity. Here I received, with a mother's transport, news from my children, the first which our uninterrupted progress had permitted to reach me.

Ever anxious about that absent portion of myself, which occupied my thoughts every hour in the day, I had written from Bordeaux to my good friend Lavalette, Director-General of the Post, requesting him to forward my letters by estafette; he, the best of fathers and of men, understood my maternal feelings, and himself fetched from my Hôtel, before my daughters left it with their aunt for Burgundy, the little packet which I now received by an estafette for Madrid. It contained two charming little letters from my girls, and at the foot of Josephine's my little Napoleon had scribbled his name—his hand being of course guided, for he was but two years old. The delicious joy of that moment can be conceived only by those who have been far separated from home, country, friends, and darling children.

Lavalette is another dear friend to whose name the tomb alone responds.

His character was such as Sterne would have delighted to depict—a curious combination of archness with ingenuousness, waggery with veracity and sincerity: at actual dissimulation he was very inexpert, of which I have heard a whimsical instance.

At the Battle of Wagram, Napoleon sent an order to one of the marshals by his favorite equerry and aid-de-camp, General Durosnel, and suddenly uttered a cry as he watched him with his telescope through the field. He had seen Durosnel struck by a bullet and rolling in the dust.

His death was a cause of mourning; he was yet young, and by his intelligent gallantry had acquired the love and esteem of his comrades, as well as of the Emperor, who eulogized him in the bulletin.

But there was one being whose heart was struck by this fatal bullet: the young and loving widow, whose visions of paradise were changed, in a moment, to grief and despair.

Durosnel, as upright as brave, had nothing to leave her: her expectations of provision rested on the Emperor; but, at all events, she could no longer reside in Paris. Her father therefore came from the country to fetch her, and preparations were making for their departure, when, about ten days after the news had reached Paris, the Empress Josephine received a letter from the Emperor in which he said:

“Durosnel is not killed, he is not even wounded; the bullet struck only his horse; LET HIS WIFE KNOW THIS.”

The commission was not easy of execution. So inured is the poor human heart to every variety of suffering that grief in any form cannot surprise it; but joy, a joy that snatches us at once from despair to bliss, oh! that must not be too rudely administered.

The Empress, knowing the effect her news must have on Madame Durosnel, was in great perplexity, and meditated going herself to her, when Lavalette and his wife arrived to breakfast with her Majesty.

“Ah! Heaven has sent you to my aid,” she exclaimed.

Then, explaining the whole affair, she imposed the task on Lavalette, and adding the caution—"Take care what you are about, for you may KILL HER," she pushed him by the shoulders, and sent him to Madame Durosnel. The good-natured Lavalette gladly undertook to carry peace to an afflicted bosom; but just as he reached the door he began to be staggered by the amount of happiness his tidings imported, and to comprehend the delicacy of his mission.

"Diablo!" thought the AMBASSADOR, as he ascended the stairs; "I almost repent my hasty compliance."

It was barely eleven o'clock, an ill-selected hour for a visit, as the father would probably have hinted; but the Empress's name silenced all objections, and he was immediately introduced into Madame Durosnel's boudoir, where she was seated on a sofa, silent and sorrowful, dressed in weeds, weepers, and all the mournful paraphernalia of early widowhood. As he gazed on her pale and altered countenance, and on the languid eye, raised to meet his, he thought:

"The Empress is right—I shall certainly kill her."

He sat down beside her, but after the first salutation had not a word to offer, while Madame Durosnel, supposing he came to announce some favor from the Emperor, properly waited till he should open the conference. Finding him, however, obstinately silent, she at length began with a trembling voice:

"Her Majesty is doubly gracious in condescending——"

Lavalette started as if suddenly aroused from a dream.

"Madame," said he, "are you beginning to feel consolation?"

"Ah, sir!" was all the wretched mourner could reply, and her face was instantly bathed in tears.

"Deuce take it!" he inwardly ejaculated; "if she reverts to her despair, what can I do?"

And he began turning over every expedient that might put her upon the scent; none appeared more likely than inquiring whether she believed in ghosts.

"Alas! no, sir; would that I could both believe and see them!" and her tears flowed afresh.

In proportion as her grief interested him did the perplexity of her comforter increase; but as something must be done, he at last devised a tale of a woman buried in a trance, and recalled from the tomb by the gravedigger opening it with a design of plunder. This story he related with all the accompaniments of romance, dwelling with especial emphasis on the ineffable joy of his heroine's family on recovering their beloved from the jaws of death. . . .

"Alas!" ejaculated Madame Durosnel, in a voice interrupted by sobs; "they were very happy!"

And she buried her head in the cushions, both to weep at liberty and to avoid the sight of a man who seemed to be making a jest of her affliction.

Lavalette began to think his task hopeless, but resolving on a new attempt, he assumed an air of cheerfulness that contrasted strangely with his anxiety. Putting on his best smiles, he asked Madame Durosnel whether she had breakfasted.

"Ah, Mon Dieu!" she exclaimed, beginning to suspect the Empress Josephine's nephew was somewhat crazed.

Lavalette grew impatient, and repeated the inquiry.

"I do not know, sir," she answered, "whether you are aware that your discourse is very extraordinary. I beg permission to retire."

"And how is it, Madame," retorted Lavalette, "that you cannot discover the real object of my mission?"

His expressive countenance conveyed all the rapture his news imported, and Madame Durosnel, as she surveyed it, fell back on the sofa, exclaiming:

"Ah! what can have happened?"

"Why, nothing at all—nothing has happened! Do you now understand me, Madame? Will you divest yourself of those villainous weeds? Your husband is not dead!" and having uttered the decisive words, he sank down exhausted with the effort. Meanwhile, an alarming shriek from the overjoyed wife brought her father to her aid, and Lavalette hastened to escape. The blunt manner in which, after all his reflections, he had communicated such joyful tidings had nearly upset Madame Durosnel's reason.

Two years afterward, at Prince Schwartzberg's ball, this lady was thrown down and trampled on in the confusion occasioned by the fire; her husband found her in a state of insensibility, and a man standing over her occupied in abstracting her earrings from her ears. Her arms and legs were dreadfully burned, while, strange to say, her silk stockings were scarcely singed.

This disaster, which gave rise to so many sinister forebodings, took place on Sunday, 1st of July. Prince Schwartzenberg occupied the old Hôtel Montesson, in the Rue de Provence; and the apartments not being sufficiently spacious to accommodate the immense concourse of company, a temporary ballroom was constructed in the garden. It was like a fairy palace. Flowers, perfumes, delicious music, the dazzling splendor of diamonds and rubies, all combined to render it a scene of Oriental enchantment. The walls of the ballroom were covered with gold and silver brocade, and ornamented with draperies of spangled gauze fastened by bouquets of flowers, while hundreds of crystal girandoles shed their prismatic luster over the glittering scene.

When the fire was first discovered, the Emperor was passing round the room and conversing with the ladies. There was but one door for the ingress and egress of the company. It was a very large one, opening into the garden, and fronting the Throne. At the back of the Throne there was a small wooden gallery, which made a communication between the ballroom and the house. It was in the angle of this little gallery that the fire was first discovered. The ball had just commenced, and a great part of the company were dancing.

It was at the time remarked as very extraordinary that nobody thought of ascending the gallery above mentioned and escaping into the house; but it was certainly natural to fly from the flames which issued from the house, or at least appeared to do so. The Empress was in conversation with some ladies at a little distance from the Throne, and when the confusion and alarm commenced, she, with great sang-froid, or perhaps it may be called courage, ascended the steps of the Throne, seated herself, and waited till the Emperor went to her.

As to the Emperor, his conduct on this occasion was beyond all praise. He handed the Empress into the first carriage which he found standing in the courtyard, and accompanied her as far as the Place Louis XV. He then returned alone to Prince Schwartzenberg's Hôtel, where he actively exerted himself in giving orders and assisting the persons who had been burned or otherwise hurt. On the Emperor's return the engines had not yet arrived. The Austrian Embassy were loud in their praise of the noble confidence evinced by the Emperor in returning alone to the scene of terror in the middle of the night. He remained on the spot till half-past three on the following morning.

The deeply-lamented victim of this catastrophe, the unfortunate Princess Schwartzenberg, was killed by returning to the ballroom in search of her daughter, who, however, had been saved. A luster fell from the ceiling on the head of the Princess and fractured her skull. She fell into an aperture, caused by the burning of the floor, and her body, with the exception of her bosom and part of one arm, was burned to a cinder. The body was recognizable only by a gold chain round the neck, to which was suspended a locket set round with jewels, whose initial letters formed a motto. The Princess was one of the most charming women of her time: beautiful, amiable, graceful, and accomplished.

Prince Eugène had the good fortune to perceive a small private door behind the Throne, which had been made for the use of the servants who handed round the refreshments. The Prince saved his wife by conducting her through that door to the interior of the house. The Princesse de la Leyen, the niece of the Prince Primate, was burned in a most frightful manner. Like the Princess Schwartzenberg, she had left her daughter dancing, and returned to the ballroom to rescue her. The young lady and her father, after fruitlessly searching for the Princess, concluded that she had returned to Passy, where they resided. On reaching home, however, they found she was not there.

The family then became dreadfully alarmed. The Prince threw off his embroidered coat and decorations, and hastened back to Paris in search of her. Meanwhile a Swedish officer had carried out from the burning ruins of the ballroom the almost lifeless remains of a female. Her countenance was so blackened and disfigured that it was impossible to recognize her features. The silver mounting of her diamond tiara had melted, and penetrated into her head. Hearing a faint groan uttered by what appeared to be merely a mass of cinder, the officer discovered that life was not yet extinct. He conveyed the Princess to a shop in the neighborhood of the Ambassador's Hôtel, where every attention was rendered to her.

After various unintelligible ejaculations, the Princess was heard to utter the word "Passy."

Eager to accomplish his humane task, the officer engaged a fiacre and drove the unfortunate lady to Passy, inquiring at every house of respectability whether anyone was missing. At length he reached the abode of the Princesse de la Leyen, whose frightful condition exceeded the worst which the fears of her family had pictured. The unfortunate lady expired on the following day, having lingered four-and-twenty hours in indescribable agony.

A lady of my acquaintance, Madame de Br——x, dame de compagnie to Madame Mère, was at Prince Schwartzberg's fête. On the alarm of fire being given, she endeavored to reach the door, but in the confusion she was thrown down and trampled on. With great effort she succeeded in raising herself up, and crawled, as she supposed, to a seat, but the floor appeared to sink under her, and she fell.

She had been unconsciously hurried into the garden, and the hollow into which she fell was a basin, which luckily happened to be dry at the time. By this means her life was saved, but she was dreadfully bruised, and the scars on her arms and neck were indelible memorials of Prince Schwartzberg's fête. This melancholy accident, in addition to its own immediate and fatal consequences, had the effect of creating a sort of superstitious terror. It naturally called to mind a similar catastrophe which occurred on the marriage of Louis XVI. and Marie Antoinette.

To return to Spain. At the miserable little village of Bribiesca we met General Regnier, whom I had not seen since the Egyptian campaign. The animated expression of his astonishment at the rencontre formed an agreeable contrast with his habitual reserve. I, however, always admired his calm dignity, and his comrades acknowledged his military talents.

Alas! our next meeting was in a desert yet more wild than Bribiesca.

I rejoiced on arriving at Burgos, where the Duke's headquarter's were fixed, for I was seriously ill, and much in want of repose. Here I enjoyed all its charms, and the consciousness that I was not compelled to raise my head from its pillow at the beat of drum imparted real luxury to the sound of the morning reveille.

General Solignac was under great obligations to Junot for procuring him employment at the recommendation of the Grand-Duchess of Berg, in spite of Napoleon's invincible repugnance to him; and we found him stationed ad interim at Burgos, in lieu of General Thiébault, whose generous conduct, talents, and enlightened humanity had converted the anathemas which the Castilians so liberally vented against us into blessings.

He had been invested with the government of Old Castile, on taking possession of which he found that Burgos, although one of the most important posts in Spain, had been for two months unrestrained by the presence of any authority. It is impossible to give an idea of the amount of devastation, pillage, and assassination to which its vicinity was exposed. On our side, the most revolting injustice was daily committed, and atrocities were frequently perpetrated upon us in reprisal; these were again avenged, and a chain of horrors thus established, which afforded no hope of termination. But General Thiébault had the courage to break through it.

Justice, with her tribunals and her judges, had fled as before the sword of the exterminating angel; the few remaining inhabitants were indifferent to life, and wandered like specters through the ill-paved streets of Burgos, without wounding their feet against pointed stones, for the ground was covered with a thick bed of filth, the infected receptacle of more than a hundred human and two hundred animal carcasses. Is it not astonishing that its mephitic exhalations had not added the plague to the catalogue of woes which afflicted the unhappy Peninsula? Another month's delay, and that scourge must have followed.

Thiébault, on his arrival, saw nothing within a circuit of four or five leagues round the city but ruin, despair, and death. The condition of the barracks, the detached depots, and, above all, of the prisons and hospitals was deplorable.

Don Blanco de Salcedo, the Prefect, was a worthy man, but incompetent to remedy this mass of evil. When called upon he seconded General Thiébault with laudable zeal, but with little hope of success; and when the General proposed to begin by cleansing the city, he shook his head, saying, "Your Excellency might as well attempt to cleanse the Augean stable."

But Thiébault had not forgotten Junot's recent achievement of clearing the streets of Lisbon in 1807 of the mines caused by the earthquake of 1755, and of all other obstructions, which was not one of the least considerable benefits conferred by his Government.

The present undertaking was equally successful, and in a few months Burgos put on a new face. The shops were reopened, the markets frequented, justice resumed its course; prisons and barracks were erected, and a promenade planted along the bank of the Arlanzon, to which spot the General, willing to flatter at once the fanaticism and chivalry of the Castilians, removed the St. Peter of Cardena, and the bones of the Cid and Donna Ximena, whose tomb had been violated by our dragoons. The tomb itself he rebuilt, and it still remains, preserved with religious care, in a garden, bordered by the same river, which the Dowager-Marchioness de Villuena has since purchased from the city of Burgos. The Prefect, Corregidor, Intendant—all the authorities, in short, of Burgos, were unanimous in their tribute of praise and gratitude to Thiébault.

His predecessor I will not name: it is unnecessary to add to the pangs of remorse the martyrdom of public censure, but his name was pronounced with abhorrence, and the following is an instance of the terror he inspired:

A regiment was sent from Burgos against a guerrilla party, under the Marquis of Villa Campo, and ordered to treat the Spaniards with the most rigorous severity, especially the inhabitants of Arguano, a little village near the famous forest of Covelleda, whose deep shades, intersected only by narrow footpaths, were the resort of banditti and guerrillas. A principal feature of the whole Spanish war was the celerity with which all our movements were notified to the insurgent leaders, and the difficulty we experienced in procuring a spy or a trustworthy guide.

The battalion had to march through a frightful country, climbing rugged rocks, and crossing frozen torrents, always in dread of unforeseen and sudden dangers. They reached the village, but perceived no movement—heard no noise. Some soldiers advanced, but saw nothing—absolute solitude reigned. The officer in command, suspecting an ambush, ordered the utmost circumspection. The troops entered the street, and arrived at a small opening, where some sheaves of wheat and Indian corn, and a quantity of loaves, were still smoking on the ground, but consumed to a cinder, and swimming in floods of wine, which had streamed from leathern skins that had evidently been purposely broached, as the provisions had been burned to prevent their falling into the hands of the French.

No sooner had the soldiers satisfied themselves that, after all their toils and dangers, no refreshment was to be obtained, than they shouted with rage . . . but no vengeance was within reach! All the inhabitants had fled!—fled into that forest, where they might defy pursuit.

Suddenly cries were heard issuing from one of the deserted cottages among which the soldiers had dispersed themselves, in hopes of discovering some food or booty; they proceeded from a young woman holding a child a year old in her arms, whom the soldiers were dragging before their Lieutenant.

“Stay, Lieutenant,” said one of them; “here is a woman we have found sitting beside an old one who is past speaking; question her a little.”

She was dressed in the peasant costume of the Soria and Rioja mountains, and was pale but not trembling.

“Why are you alone here?” asked the Lieutenant.

“I stayed with my grandmother, who is paralytic and could not follow the rest to the forest,” replied she haughtily, and as if vexed at being obliged to drop a word in presence of a Frenchman—“I stayed to take care of her.”

“Why have your neighbors left the village?”

The Spaniard’s eyes flashed fire; she fixed on the Lieutenant a look of strange import, and answered:

“You know very well; were they not all to be massacred?”

The Lieutenant shrugged his shoulders.

“But why did you burn the bread and wheat, and empty the wine skins?”

"That you might find nothing; as they could not carry them off there was no alternative but burning them."

At this moment shouts of joy arose, and the soldiers appeared, carrying a number of hams, some loaves, and, more welcome than all, several skins of wine, all discovered in a vault, the entrance to which was concealed by the straw the old woman was lying on. The young peasant darted on them a glance of fiendish vengeance, while the Lieutenant, who had pondered with anxiety on the destitute condition of his troops, and the sinking sun, rejoiced for a moment in the unexpected supply. But the recent poisoning of several cisterns, and other fearful examples, putting him on his guard, he again interrogated the woman:

"Whence come these provisions?"

"They are the same as those we burned; we concealed them for our friends."

"Is your husband with yonder brigands?"

"My husband is in heaven!" said she, lifting up her eyes; "he died for the good cause—that of God and King Ferdinand!"

"Have you any brothers among them?"

"I have no longer a tie . . . except my poor child"—and she pressed the infant to her heart . . . the poor little creature was thin and sallow, but its large black eyes glistened as they turned to its mother.

"Commander," exclaimed one of the soldiers, "pray order division of the booty, for we are very hungry and thirsty."

"One moment, my man; listen," said he, eyeing the young woman with suspicion; "these provisions are good, I hope?"

"How should they be otherwise?" replied the Spaniard contemptuously; "they were not for you."

"Well! here's to thy health then, demonia," said a young sublieutenant, opening one of the skins and preparing for a draught; but his more prudent commander still restrained him.

"One moment. Since this wine is good, you will not object to a glass."

"Oh dear no! as much as you please."

And, accepting the mess-glass offered by the Lieutenant, she emptied it without hesitation.

"Huzza huzza!" shouted the soldiers, delighted at the prospect of intoxication without danger.

"And your child will drink some also," said the Lieutenant; "he is so pale that it will do him good."

The Spaniard had herself drunk without hesitation, but in holding the cup to her infant's lips her hand trembled; the motion, however, was unperceived, and the child also emptied his glass. Thereupon the provisions speedily disappeared, and all partook both of the food and wine. Suddenly, however, the infant was observed to turn livid, its features contracted, and its mouth, convulsed with agony, gave vent to piteous shrieks. The mother, too, though her fortitude suppressed all complaint, could scarcely stand, and her distorted features betrayed her sufferings.

"Wretch!" exclaimed the Commandant, "thou hast poisoned us!"

"Yes," said she with a ghastly smile, falling to the ground beside her child, already struggling with the death rattle. "Yes, I have poisoned you—I knew you would fetch the skins from their hiding place—was it likely you would leave a dying creature undisturbed on her litter? Yes—yes—you will die, and die in perdition—while I shall go to heaven——"

Her last words were scarcely audible, and the soldiers did not at first comprehend the full horror of their situation; but as the poison operated, the Spaniard's declaration was legibly translated in her convulsed features. No power could longer restrain them; in vain their commander interposed; they repulsed him, and, dragging their expiring victim by the hair to the brink of the torrent, they threw her into it, after lacerating her with more than a hundred saber strokes. She uttered not a groan. As for the child, it was the first victim.

Twenty-two men were destroyed by this exploit—which I cannot call otherwise than great and heroic. The commander himself told me he escaped by miracle.

The persuasion that the bed of death would be disturbed in search of booty was indeed holding us as savages; and such was the impression produced by the man who could command: "Let no sanctuary deter your search." By such means were the populace from the beginning exasperated against us, and especially by the oppressions of General D——. If the inhabitants of Arguano had not received information that they were to be massacred, they would not have taken the lead in massacre.

Such were the people among whom I dwelt. When this tale was related to me, on the eve of my departure from Burgos, I shuddered in contemplating the murderous war of people against people! I trembled for the first time since my entrance into Spain. I became timid. Alas! it was not on my own account; but I was again approaching the great crisis of maternity, and amid what perils, good God! was my child destined to see the light!

Napoleon's Marriage with Maria Louisa—Union of the Papal States with France—General Kellerman—Junot Quits Valladolid—Siege of Astorga—Nuptial Festivities in Paris—Maria Louisa's Regret at Leaving Vienna—Her Favorite Dog—Berthier's Scheme—Arrival of the Empress in France—Her Interview with the Emperor—A Surprise—The Emperor and Empress Visit Belgium—Abdication of Louis, King of Holland—Projected Treaty with England—M. Labouchere's Mission to London—Louis Accuses Napoleon of Bad Faith—Fouché—The Intrigue Unraveled.

I WAS at Burgos when I received the first intelligence of Napoleon's intended marriage with Maria Louisa.

A friend who wrote to me from Paris spoke of the disastrous influence which a marriage with an Austrian Princess was likely to exercise on the destiny of Napoleon. He was, it is true, Emperor of the French, but he was likewise GENERAL BONAPARTE, who had gained more than twenty pitched battles over Austria, and who had twice forced the Imperial Family to fly from their palace. These were injuries which could not but leave indelible stains behind them.

The sacrifice which the Emperor Francis was now about to make bore an odious stamp of selfishness. It appeared by no means improbable that at some future time the voice of his daughter, when appealing to him on behalf of her son and her husband, would be no more listened to than when she remonstrated for herself. It was evident that Austria, humbled and mutilated as she was, greeted this marriage only as a temporary balm to her wounds. Napoleon's object was to consolidate his Northern alliances, already well secured on the part of Russia, and to prosecute still further his fatal operations in the Peninsula.

It was likewise during my stay at Burgos that I heard of the union of the Papal States with France. It would be difficult to describe the effect which this intelligence produced in Spain. It was speedily followed by the circulation of thousands of copies of the Bull of Excommunication. Children, even in the tender age of infancy, were taught to lisp the most horrible imprecations on the French. Only those who were witnesses to the reaction which took place in Spain at this period can form a just estimate of the error which Napoleon committed in taking possession of the city of Rome, and making the Pope his captive.

We left Burgos for Valladolid, Junot having received orders to establish there the headquarters of the 8th corps. General Regnier and the 2d corps were near the Tagus, and Marshal Ney, with the 6th corps, was in Salamanca. General Kellerman, Comte de Valmy, was then Governor of Valladolid and of all the kingdom of Leon, as well as of the Asturias and a portion of Spanish Estremadura.

General Kellerman received me with the most marked courtesy. The residence prepared for me was the palace of Charles V., situated in the grand square of the city, and which had formerly been the Hôtel of the Inquisition. The palace is a fine building, and General Kellerman had taken great pains to arrange it for my reception. It did not, it is true, retain the magnificence which it presented when it was the abode of the monarch above mentioned; but such as it was, it appeared to me a paradise after my prison at Burgos.

Junot had received from Paris a letter written by the Prince de Neufchâtel, informing him that the Emperor having directed General Suchet to prosecute actively the sieges of all the towns of Catalonia and Aragon, his Majesty was also anxious that the towns of the west, which still held out, should fall at the same time. Consequently Junot was to take Astorga as speedily as possible.

Junot was overjoyed at the receipt of this letter, and immediately ordered Colonel Valazé and General Boyer, the chief officers of his staff, to make the requisite preparations. He was on the point of departing for Astorga, when he received dispatches from Madrid, directing him to proceed to Salamanca to succeed Ney, who was to be removed to some other place.

I observed that Junot was much ruffled on reading this dispatch. "Why," said I, "should you vex yourself about these contradictory orders? You cannot obey them both. Write to Marshal Ney, and see what his answer will be. His movements must correspond with yours, and yours with his."

Junot followed my advice, and Valladolid not being far from Salamanca, he received an answer in two days. Ney informed Junot that he had received orders from the Commander-in-Chief of the French army, the Prince de Neufchâtel, which orders certainly did not authorize them to fall back on Valladolid. He added that he thought it also the duty of Junot to obey the instructions of Berthier, for that he and the Emperor were their ONLY COMMANDERS.

On learning Ney's resolution, Junot resolved to commence the siege of Astorga. Such was the conduct of the generals whom the Emperor placed under each other's orders in Spain. I shall have to record many examples of the same kind which occurred after the arrival of Masséna.

Junot quitted Valladolid on the 14th of April, and arrived at Astorga on the 17th. As he was passing the bridge of Leon a musket ball fell at the distance of a few paces from his horse, between him and his aid-de-camp. The musket had been fired from a little hill near the bridge. Two officers immediately ascended to the summit of the hill, but no one was to be seen. Junot had a narrow escape, for the assassin had taken his aim well.

On his arrival at Astorga, Junot fixed his headquarters at Castrillo. The digging of the trenches continued for two days, and on the 20th Junot ordered the firing to commence. At seven in the evening the breach was opened. Next day, the 21st, Junot gave orders for an attack. The breach was carried by the bataillon d'élite, commanded by M. de Lagrave, one of the Duke's aids-de-camp, a brave and intelligent young officer. At four in the morning of the 22d the town offered to capitulate, and at one in the afternoon the garrison, amounting to 3,500 men, defiled before the Duke and marched in the direction of France.

On the day when the first column of prisoners arrived at Valladolid, M. Magnien asked me to go out in a calèche to see them defile. The weather was delightfully fine, and I should have enjoyed an agreeable drive but for a circumstance which filled me with feelings of the most painful kind. I suddenly heard a discharge of musketry at a little distance, and the report of the firing re-echoed amid the hills which rose along the roadside.

"What is that?" said I to M. Magnien. He could not inform me, and he repeated my question to an officer who commanded the convoy of the prisoners.

"Oh, nothing," replied the officer carelessly; "some of those fellows pretend to be lame, and say they cannot march, so I have ordered them to be shot, that's all. Lame indeed! I'll answer for it, that if we were to leave them behind they would soon find the use of their legs to rejoin Don Julian!"

I was horror-struck, and could scarcely believe that I had understood the man rightly. We had by this time arrived at a turn of the road, and I saw two men fall. I felt my blood curdle, and the chill of death seemed to be creeping over me. "Turn back! for heaven's sake, turn back!" I exclaimed to Magnien; "I cannot bear this!"

"And do you imagine, madame," said the officer who had charge of the convoy, "that our prisoners are better treated on board the pontoons of Cadiz? My brother perished there." These words were uttered in a tone and accompanied by a look of revenge which seemed like a sentence of death on the wretched captives.

The musket shot which was fired at Junot on his way from Valladolid to Astorga reminds me of another attempt to assassinate him which occurred at Lisbon. His aids-de-camp had frequently been troubled by applications from a man who solicited an audience of the Duke, under various frivolous pretenses. At length, M. Hersant, one of Junot's aids-de-camp, arrested the man one evening when he was endeavoring to slip into the interior apartments unperceived. He was searched, and upon his person were found a poignard and a knife. He did not deny his murderous design, trusting that the presence of the English would save him. But, to do them justice, they showed no disposition to interfere in the affair, except to urge the punishment of the criminal.

Junot himself passed sentence on him. "Go your ways," said he; "I will not shed your blood. There are twenty piasters for you, and tell your comrades that I offer a hundred to anyone who will come here and follow your example."

Meanwhile Paris was enlivened by fêtes in honor of the Imperial nuptials. The letters which I received from my friends were like the descriptions in romances and fairy tales. As I was not in Paris at that time, I will not enter into a detail of matters which I did not witness; but I cannot forbear relating the following anecdote connected with Napoleon's marriage:

Berthier, Prince de Neufchâtel, was sent to Vienna to conduct the Empress to Paris. After she had been married by proxy [to her uncle, Prince Charles], and all the forms and ceremonies were gone through (which in Vienna is a work of no little time), the day of departure was fixed. The young Archduchess often shed tears of regret at her approaching separation from her family. In the Imperial Family of Austria the bonds of relationship are sacredly revered; and even in the reign of Maria Theresa, and under the cold and artful policy of Kaunitz, family ties were held dear. Maria Louisa had been educated in these feelings: she wept to leave her sisters, her father, and her stepmother, and perhaps also she wept at the thought of being united to a man who must have been to her almost an object of terror.

At length the day of departure arrived. The young Empress bade farewell to all the members of her family, and then retired to her apartment, where etiquette required that she should wait till Berthier came to conduct her to her carriage. When Berthier entered the cabinet he found her bathed in tears. With a voice choked by sobs she apologized for appearing so childish. "But," said she, "my grief is excusable. See how I am surrounded here by a thousand things that are dear to me. These are my sister's drawings, that tapestry was wrought by my mother, those paintings are by my Uncle Charles." In this manner she went through the inventory of her cabinet, and there was scarcely a thing, down to the carpet on the floor, which was not the work of some beloved hand. There were her singing birds, her parrot, and, above all, the object which she seemed to value most, and most to regret—a little dog.

It was, of course, known at the Court of Vienna how greatly the Emperor used to be annoyed by Josephine's favorite pet dogs, with FORTUNÉ at their head. Therefore Francis II., like a prudent father, took care that his daughter should leave her pet dog at Vienna. Yet it was a cruel separation, and the Princess and her favorite parted with a tender duo of complaint.

But these regrets, childish as they may appear, Berthier regarded as proofs of a kind and affectionate heart, and when he beheld the tears of the young Archduchess, whom he had expected to find all radiant with smiles, a scheme entered his mind which he tacitly resolved to carry into execution. "I have merely come to acquaint your Majesty," said he, "that you need not depart for two hours to come. I will therefore withdraw until that time." He went immediately to the Emperor and acquainted him with his plan. Francis II., who was the most indulgent of fathers, readily assented to the proposition. Berthier gave his orders, and in less than two hours all was ready.

The Empress left Vienna and soon entered France; she found herself surrounded by festivals and rejoicings, and almost forgot the parrot and the dog. She arrived at Compiègne, and was there met by the Emperor, who stopped her carriage, stepped into it, and seated himself by her side; they proceeded to Saint Cloud and thence to Paris. There Fortune bestowed one of her last smiles on her favorite son, when, leading into the balcony of the Tuileries his young bride, whom he regarded as the pledge of lasting peace and alliance, he presented her to the multitude who were assembled beneath the windows of the Palace.*

On returning from the balcony, he said to her: "Well, Louise, I must give you some little reward for the happiness you have conferred on me;" and leading her into one of the narrow corridors of the Palace, lighted only by one lamp, he hurried on with his beloved Empress, who exclaimed: "Where are we going?" "Come, Louise, come, are you afraid to follow me?" replied the Emperor, who now pressed to his bosom, with much affectionate tenderness, his young bride.

Suddenly they stopped at a closed door, within which they heard a dog that was endeavoring to escape from the apparent prison. The Emperor opened this private door, and desired Louise to enter. She found herself in a room magnificently lighted; the glare of the lamps prevented her for some moments from distinguishing any object; imagine her surprise when she found her favorite dog from Vienna was there to greet her; the apartment was furnished with the same chairs, carpet, the paintings of her sisters, her birds—in short, every object was there, and placed in the room in the same manner as she had left them on quitting her paternal roof.

The Empress, in joy and in gratitude, threw herself in Napoleon's arms, and the moment of a great victory would not have been to the conqueror of the world so sweet as this instant of ecstasy was to the infatuated heart of the adoring bridegroom. After a few minutes had been spent in examining the apartment, the Emperor opened a small door; he beckoned to Berthier, who entered. Napoleon then said: "Louise, it is to him you are indebted for this unexpected joy: I desire you will embrace him, as a just recompense." Berthier took the hand of the Empress, but the Emperor added: "No, no; you must kiss my old and faithful friend."

*"The Empress Maria Louisa was nineteen years of age when she married Napoleon; her hair was of a light color, her eyes blue and expressive, her walk was noble and her figure imposing. Her hands and feet were formed in perfect beauty, and might serve for models. Health, youth, and a florid complexion were joined to much timidity: this latter occasioned the Empress to appear haughty before the ladies of the Court; in private, however, she was amiable, and even affectionate. She appeared to love the Emperor, and was devoted to his will."—Constant.

Some weeks after his marriage the Emperor took the Empress with him into Belgium. Maria Louisa received the homage that was paid to her with a certain air of indifference, and there then seemed little reason to expect that she would do the honors of the Court with the grace and amiability which she subsequently displayed.

But an event which caused me more astonishment than all that was going on in Paris was the FORCED abdication of Louis, King of Holland. Louis had been a dear friend of my mother, and his kind and amiable temper made me esteem him very highly. His conduct, which some have blamed and others approved, was in my opinion always that of an honest man. He had a circle of friends devotedly attached to him, and these friends were also mine. I received through them the details of the revolution in Holland—for the abdication of Louis must be termed a revolution.

Louis comprehended his brother's Continental System; but he understood better the interests of the people he had been called upon to govern. These people, who were strangers to customhouse duties, and who were at one period of their history the most flourishing commercial nation in the world, were languishing beneath the terrible system of confiscations and prohibitions. Louis refused to be any longer the instrument of a system of tyranny which was a deathblow to the prosperity of Holland.

Hereupon the Emperor directed an army, commanded by General Oudinot, to advance into Holland. Louis then abdicated, but only in favor of his son. This abdication was rejected. Marshal Oudinot entered Amsterdam, and Europe learned that Holland was incorporated with the French Empire.

When Napoleon found that his brother would not bend to his will, he requested, or rather ordered, his abdication. Louis was of an amiable and pliant disposition; but when he was required to take a step which he could not consent to without injuring his children and his subjects, he displayed a remarkable degree of firmness. He consented to abdicate, but only on certain conditions.

He proposed to his brother that overtures should be made to England, and by rendering the affairs of Holland the basis of a treaty, peace might be obtained, pro-

The Emperor consented to this, and the King of Holland sent M. Labouchere to England to open negotiations. The Marquis of Wellesley was then at the head of the English Ministry. M. Labouchere was well known as one of the first bankers in Europe. His transactions with England were extensive and honorable. Every facility was consequently afforded him for effecting the desired object. The affair proceeded as well as could be wished, when, in an interview which the King of Holland had with his brother, I think at Antwerp, he asked the Emperor why, in an affair which concerned his happiness and the honor of his crown, he behaved with such bad faith, and exposed him to such treatment on the part of England. The Emperor stared at him with astonishment, and knew not what he meant.

"While," continued the King of Holland, "I have in perfect good faith sent to England an honorable man, whose very presence is a sufficient guarantee of my intentions, you have sent an obscure intriguer, for no other would accept such a mission, to treat for you without my concurrence." "It is false!" exclaimed the Emperor, his eyes flashing with rage: "I say it is false!" "And I repeat that it is true," continued his brother. "M. Labouchere has been informed of the fact." "In the devil's name," exclaimed the Emperor, "to whom do you allude? I know nothing of him! . . . I have sent no one!" "But your minister, Fouché, has," said Louis. "I repeat that the individual I allude to is at present in London, negotiating for you, and discussing those very interests which were to form the basis of our treaty. Is this all the confidence I can place in a brother's promise?"

The Emperor was greatly agitated; he turned pale, and pressed his forehead with his hand, threw himself into his chair, and then rose up again. At length, stepping up to his brother, he said: "I perceive there is some plot here; but I know nothing of it. As a Sovereign and a brother, I pledge my word of honor that I am ignorant of it. Do you believe me?" "I do," replied Louis; "but it behooves you to seek out the author of this foul intrigue. It is a duty you owe to me as well as to your own honor. Who could have dared thus to act in your name?" To this question the Emperor made no answer, but it was evident that a terrible cloud was gathering. His brow lowered, his lips were compressed, and everything betokened a dreadful ebullition of rage. "You may rely on it, I will discover this tissue of deception," said he to his brother; "I have my suspicion of the serpent who has been laying his snare."

On his return to Paris the Emperor put the affair into the hands of Dubois, who speedily discovered that Fouché sent agents to England much more frequently than the affairs of the Police required. Having found the thread of the intrigue, he soon traced out the whole, and the emissary was arrested and sent to the Temple. This man proved to be Chevalier Fagan, a returned emigrant. He confidently believed that he was acting on the part of the Emperor, and had no idea that he was merely an agent of Fouché. The result of this affair was Fouché's disgrace, the cause of which was entirely unknown at the time.

Other events, equally curious, were going on in the north of Europe. Bernadotte was chosen King of Sweden by the States-General assembled at Orebro, and Charles XIII. adopted him as his son. When he presented himself at the Tuileries to announce to the Emperor his elevation to the Throne of Sweden, Napoleon did not appear inclined to allow him to go and reign so far off. Bernadotte, observing his scruples, said: "Would your Majesty, then, elevate me above yourself by forcing me to refuse a crown?" The Emperor looked confused, but immediately recovering his presence of mind, answered: "Well! well! be it so! Our destinies must be fulfilled." Subsequent events proved that the Emperor's fears of Bernadotte were not unfounded.

Fêtes at Valladolid—Arrival of the Prince d'Essling—The Cortége—Masséna's Companion—His Uneasiness—Junot's Conversation with Him—Marshal Ney—Siege of Ciudad-Rodrigo—A Quarrel Threatened—The Emperor's Gloomy Forebodings—Masséna's Retreat—Junot Wounded—Anecdote of the Duke of Wellington.

WE, TOO, had our amusements at Valladolid. General Kellerman gave a ball, and I gave another.

Among the belles who figured at these parties one of the most admired was the Marquise d'Arabacca, the daughter of the Intendant of Valladolid. She was a fine woman, of lively and agreeable manners. When I was talking about her one day with an officer of the Duke's staff, he quoted a couplet of an old French song, and said:

« Elle aime à rire, elle aime à boire, Elle aime à chanter comme nous. »

I learned that the Marchioness had an excellent piano-forte, of which she made no use, and I wrote to request that she would lend it to me. She replied to me by a little note very elegantly written. When I say a little note, I mean three or four lines, but written on a sheet of paper almost as large as that used for official dispatches. This is the custom in the south of Europe. In Italy the ladies never write on note paper. The Marquise d'Arabacca sent me the piano. As soon as it arrived I sat down to try it. I liked the tone very much, but there was an unpleasant jarring in the bass which I could not account for. I opened the instrument, and found lying across the bass strings a little packet of cigars (cigaritas). This immediately explained to me the application of the couplet quoted by the officer.

One day after the arrival of an estafette from Paris I observed that Junot appeared out of humor. I asked him what was the matter.

"We are to have a new Commander-in-Chief of the Army of Portugal," replied he with a forced smile. "The Emperor does not think Marshal Ney or me fit for the trust. We are to be placed under guardianship."

"Who is appointed?" inquired I.

"Oh! I cannot complain of the choice that has been made. . . . It is Masséna. . . . He is our senior. . . . I only hope that Ney will accommodate himself to this arrangement as readily as I do."

Next day a letter was received from Vittoria announcing that the Prince d'Essling might be expected at the end of the week. Orders were given for preparing for his reception one-half of the Palace in which we resided; but we had then no idea that he was to be accompanied by a lady.

The day of his expected arrival was exceedingly fine. Junot and General Kellerman, accompanied by their Staffs and principal officers, went on horseback to meet him. The cortège amounted to at least two hundred individuals.

When they had advanced about a league from the town they perceived the equipages of the Marshal and his suite. Masséna rode first in a small uncovered calèche, and at his side was seated a very boyish officer of dragoons, decorated with the Cross of the Legion of Honor. As this badge of distinction was then very sparingly distributed, its appearance on the breast of so very young an officer attracted general remark.

Masséna's companion seemed anxious to evade notice, and when the Marshal perceived the numerous retinue that was advancing to meet him, he wished to draw up the hood of the calèche; but he had not time, for the three Generals-in-Chief set off at full gallop and came up with him in two or three minutes.

They gave him a most cordial reception. Junot was too generous not to relinquish all claims to precedence, whatever he might feel. Ney was sometimes actuated by amiable impulses, and Reignier was too prudent to manifest the least mortification.

However, Masséna appeared ill at ease. From time to time he was observed to cast on his young companion a glance of distress, which was very amusing to some, and was not at all understood by others. As to the young officer of dragoons, he sat with his eyes cast down and riveted on the points of his boots.

"Monsieur le Maréchal," said Junot, "my wife will be delighted to have the honor of receiving you in the Palace of Charles V. We hope you will be accommodated to your satisfaction."

"How," exclaimed Masséna, with evident confusion; "is Madame Junot at Valladolid?"

"Certainly," replied Junot, not a little surprised at the astonishment expressed by the Marshal.

"Then," said Masséna, after a little hesitation, "I cannot think of going to reside in the Palace—that cannot be."

"If you are afraid of not having sufficient room," observed Junot, somewhat piqued, "my wife and I must turn out—you are my superior in command."

"Mon Dieu! I do not mean that. . . . I do not mean that," exclaimed Masséna; "but——"

He did not finish this sentence, and Junot could scarcely refrain from laughing outright, for at that moment someone whispered in his ear that the Marshal's military companion was a young lady!

The confusion of the veteran Marshal as he drove on to Valladolid may be easily conceived. As soon as he reached the foot of the Grand Staircase he requested Junot to conduct him to my apartments. He advanced to me with his usual frankness of manner, pressed my hand, and expressed himself overjoyed to see me. I was informed that he was very glad Junot's heart was in safe keeping, for that he was very jealous of Clausel and Kellerman. As to the lady, she immediately retired to her own apartment, and during the three months which the Prince d'Essling passed at Valladolid, I never caught a glimpse of her but once. She had strict orders to keep herself concealed.

Masséna was not a Frenchman by birth, but he was one of the most remarkable men in our Revolution. He was naturally ill-tempered, and his manners were not very polished. Being at an early period of his life placed in a situation in which talent could find its reward, he rapidly distinguished himself in his military career, and it was he whom Bonaparte succeeded in the command of the Army of Italy. Masséna was of a selfish disposition, and was often cruel in conquest. The Emperor esteemed his military genius very highly, and regretted that he was sometimes under the necessity of treating him harshly.

Masséna felt Ney's behavior, but he was the better dissembler of the two, and he concealed his ill-humor beneath an air of assumed indifference.

Masséna had as much regard for me as I believe he could have for anyone who could be of no service to him. He used often to come and chat with me in the morning, and these visits were very agreeable to me, as they afforded me some insight into the character of a man who seems to have been but imperfectly known to most of his biographers.

Lieutenant-Colonel Valazé, a young officer of engineers, was a particular favorite of the Duc d'Abrantès. Junot introduced him to Masséna, with the request that he would put him in the way of advancement, by intrusting him with the command of the siege of Ciudad-Rodrigo. Masséna replied that nothing would give him greater pleasure, and Valazé set out for Salamanca as soon as he had received instructions from the General-in-Chief.

Two days after this, Masséna was in my drawing-room playing at some game with Junot, when Valazé suddenly entered. He had returned to Valladolid; Ney would not allow him to be employed. He had no fault to find with him—but he said he had officers of his own; "And the Prince d'Essling," observed he, "Prince as he is, shall not dictate to me how I am to form my Staff."

On the following morning Masséna had a conversation with Junot, in which the latter had great difficulty to pacify him. He was for sending Marshal Ney back again to France.

"You will find," exclaimed he, "that that proud fellow will thwart all our operations by his obstinacy and his vanity."

Junot said nothing, either to defend or blame Ney, though he had been hurt by an observation made by the Marshal, which some person had foolishly repeated to him. Ney had said:

"There is no occasion for the Duc d'Abrantès to trouble me with his protégés. If they are so very clever, let him keep them to himself."

These ebullitions of ill-temper often placed Ney in a light which was anything but heroic; yet he was nevertheless a true hero.

Valazé was dispatched a second time to Salamanca. The young man was tossed to and fro like a ball between rackets. Ney flew into a passion, and sent Masséna a very angry letter, in which he told him that he neither regarded his orders nor feared his menaces, when he attempted to disturb the Staff of the army formed by the Prince de Neufchâtel. I cannot attempt to describe Masséna's anger on the perusal of this letter, which he held in his hand when he entered our apartment.

"You see," said he, "how impossible it is to make anything of this man."

This he spoke in a loud and vehement tone, as he paced backward and forward through the room.

I endeavored to calm him, but in vain; and Valazé, who felt his dignity compromised by being thus repulsed, willingly relinquished the honor of commanding the siege. The Prince, however, resolved to go in person to Ciudad-Rodrigo for the express purpose of taking Valazé there. All this boded but indifferently for the success of the approaching campaign.

We now left Valladolid for Salamanca. There was in the Army of Portugal a General of Division commanding the artillery (General Éblé), another commanding the cavalry (General M——), and a third who was chief officer of the Staff (General Fririon). General M—— was a perfect caricature of Murat. He wore on his head a shapska surmounted by feathers, his Polish cloak was lined with fur, and his boots were not unfrequently red. He was not, however, so good looking as Murat. But he was a brave officer, though he rendered himself ridiculous by endeavoring to imitate Murat, with a stature of five feet eight inches. During the campaign of Wagram, he commanded a fortified castle at which M. de Metternich halted under an escort of French gendarmérie on his return to his native country. General M—— assumed airs of importance which were the more galling to M. de Metternich, inasmuch as the castle was the property of his wife.

Having exercised his hospitality after a fashion of his own, the General said to the captive Minister:

"Your pardon, Monsieur le Comte; if I were in my own house I would give you a better reception."

At length the siege of Ciudad-Rodrigo commenced. The three Generals-in-Chief left Salamanca to invest a paltry village; for Ciudad-Rodrigo was nothing more. The works were in great part under the direction of Valazé. Masséna was greatly irritated against Ney, and this occasioned a coolness between him and Junot; for the latter defended Ney, who in fact was in the right.

The troops began to defile upon Ciudad-Rodrigo. They were taken from each army corps; and that of Junot, as well as the second and the sixth, furnished its contingent. In the course of these movements some letters passed between Junot and Masséna, at which Junot took offense, and on one occasion a very sharp explanation ensued in consequence. This angry feeling had not subsided before a fresh ground of discord arose respecting a company of artillery belonging to Junot's army corps, which had received orders to defile upon Ciudad-Rodrigo. On learning this fact, the Duke inquired of General Fouché and General Boyer whether they had received and given orders for the departure of the company, and on their answering in the negative, he entered my apartment in a state of irritation, such as I never remember to have seen him in. He did not observe me; but seized his hat and saber, and as he clasped his belt, he said, fortunately loud enough for me to hear:

"There must be an end of this. I am tired of it. A good saber blow will settle all."

I threw myself before him, to prevent his leaving the apartment.

"What are you thinking of?" I exclaimed, in an agony of alarm. He stopped and looked at me with a sort of wild stare; then, seizing me by the arm, he thrust me aside.

"Leave me, Laura," said he, "this affair concerns not you. Leave me. My honor is compromised by this proceeding of the Prince d'Essling. He knows my character. He knows that I will not bear an insult, and surely it is an insult to give orders to the troops in my army corps without consulting me. It is not the first time; I have an old score to settle with him. Leave me, I desire you."

He grasped the hilt of his sword; I plainly saw that he was bent on a duel.

"You shall not leave this room!" said I, for the Prince d'Essling's quarters were so near ours that he would have been there in a few moments, and I was satisfied that, at the first word, Masséna would have been as ready to fight as he himself.

"You shall not leave this room!" I repeated, placing my back to the door; but this was too feeble an obstacle to restrain Junot. He took me up in his arms, in spite of my resistance and, placing me on a chair, opened the door and was going out. The door of the apartment opened into the drawing-room, and there, to his surprise, he found assembled General Boyer, MM. Magnien, Michaud, and Fisson, and Colonel Grandsaigne; in short, with one single exception, he found there none but his friends. The individual who formed this exception, and whom I would name but that he is now suffering under misfortune, was the cause of great mischief both to my husband and to Marshal Ney. I followed Junot into the drawing-room, and addressing myself to those whom I knew to be most devoted to my husband's interests, I conjured them to use all their influence with him. Fortunately there was no need to do so; with Junot the first impulse was always the most to be dreaded. He now felt that he could not, with any shade of propriety, challenge the veteran of the glory of Rivoli, but he nevertheless made some angry remarks about him. These were reported to Masséna with some additions, and the Prince d'Essling, when he afterward told me what he had heard, repeated many expressions which Junot never uttered. Amid these unpleasant feelings, Junot and Masséna left Salamanca to invest Ciudad-Rodrigo. The English with Wellington at their head were advancing from Almeida to relieve the garrison and make a diversion in its favor.

The letters which I received from France brought me a mass of intelligence of divers kinds; for I received all at once letters which had been successively forwarded to me during an interval of months. They exhibited a curious mélange of successes, reverses, losses, aggrandizements, disgraces, and favors. First there was the dismissal of Fouché, of which I had not previously heard;* next the taking of the Isle of France by the English; then the pompous opening of the canal of Saint Quentin; then the incorporation of the Hanse Towns, Holland, and several small states with the French Empire. About the same time we took possession of the Valais in Switzerland, which was merely termed A DEPARTMENT. The French Empire then extended from the 54th to the 42d degree of latitude.

All the letters I received concurred on one point—viz, that the Emperor was greatly changed, in every respect, since his marriage. His position was of a nature to produce in his mind some degree of inquietude. The more the Empire increased—the farther it extended—the more anxiety it was likely to excite in him, who had created so extraordinary and glorious a power. Affairs had reached that critical point when even a conquest was but a triumph mingled with alarm.

For example, when Napoleon took possession of the Duchy of Oldenburg, he did so for the furtherance of his Continental System, and his Continental blockade of all the coast of the North Sea. But the Emperor Alexander could not be satisfied by these motives. The deposed Prince was his brother-in-law, and when he heard of the event he angrily exclaimed: "The Emperor Napoleon is much too selfish!" These words are the more remarkable, inasmuch as they were uttered in the year preceding the disasters of Russia.

The letters which I received from my friends in Paris naturally made mention of the new Empress. The most various opinions were pronounced upon her. Cardinal Maury sent me a letter in which he said: "I will not attempt to describe how much the Emperor is attached to our charming Empress. This time he may be said to be really in love; more truly in love than he ever was with Josephine, for, after all, he never saw her while she was very young. She was upward of thirty when they were married. But Maria Louisa is as young and as blooming as spring. You will be enchanted with her when you see her."

Maria Louisa's brilliant complexion particularly charmed the Cardinal. For my own part, I did not see her till after her accouchement, and even then, though I was told that she had grown pale, I thought she had too much color, especially when in the least heated. The Cardinal was a great admirer of Maria Louisa, though he had wished the Emperor to marry one of the Russian Grand-Duchesses. "The Empress," added he in the letter above mentioned, "is gay, gracious, and I may even say FAMILIAR with those persons whom the Emperor permits her to receive in her intimate circle; her manners are charming to those who are admitted to the petites soirées at the Tuileries. Their Majesties join the company at reversis or billiards. I really wish that you and the Duke could see how happy the Emperor is."

I was informed by other friends that one of the amusements of the Imperial soirées, before the Emperor entered the salon, was to see the Empress turn her ear round, for, by a movement of the muscles of the jaw, she possessed the singular power of making her ear turn round of itself, almost in a circle. I never heard of anyone except Maria Louisa who could do this.

The Emperor wished to remove, as far as was consistent with etiquette, a frequent cause of dissension between him and the Empress Josephine, namely, the numerous visitors received by the latter. Maria Louisa was young, and ignorant of the world, and though accustomed to a great deal of Court etiquette, yet her private circle had been limited to the members of her own family. Thus the rules prescribed by the Emperor neither surprised nor displeased her. One of these rules was that she should receive no male visitors. Paër was the only exception, because he was her music master, and it was ordered that one of the Empress's ladies should be present while she received her lesson.

One day, while the Court was at Saint Cloud, the Emperor unexpectedly presented himself in the Empress's apartments. He perceived a man whose countenance he did not at first recognize. This violation of his rule displeased him, and he expressed himself rather angrily to the dame de service, who, I think, was Madame Brignole. She replied that the gentleman was Bennais,* who had come himself to explain the secret spring of a serre-papier which he had been making for her Majesty. "No matter," said the Emperor, "he is a man. My orders on this subject must not be departed from, or we shall soon have no rules."

* Bennais was goldsmith to the Emperor.

During my abode at Salamanca I received intelligence of Junot's wound. It was brought to me by a young officer, a nephew of Casabianca, the Senator. He likewise delivered to me a letter from Junot, but it was scarcely legible; it had been written about two hours before the operation.

"I have been wounded," said Junot in his letter, "in the face by a ball, which broke my nose, and entered my right cheek, where it was stopped by striking against the bone. It is a lucky escape, for had the wound been half an inch higher up, or more in front, I should have been killed. As it is, I shall only have to keep my bed some days, and to suffer a few minutes' pain on the extraction of the ball."

On the 14th of November Masséna began to retire before the Duke of Wellington, but it was not until the month of January that he fully determined on his retreat. He then wished to mislead the English by making hostile demonstrations, and continuing them on the left flank of the enemy's army. The Duke of Wellington was not to be caught in this snare, which, indeed, would scarcely have entrapped a young sublieutenant. Unluckily, he knew too well the precarious and unfortunate condition of the French army.

He opposed to the grand reconnoissance which Junot commanded in person the Brunswick chasseurs, the Hanoverian foot chasseurs, and some squadrons of other troops. Junot, accompanied by General Boyer, his principal Staff officer, was on horseback at a little distance from Rio-Mayor, in front of a very thick forest. He was in his full uniform, and wore his grand cordon. One of the Brunswick chasseurs posted in the forest fired at him with a carbine, and the ball entered exactly in the middle of the nose. Junot did not fall; he merely raised his hand to his face, and said:

"Parbleu, Boyer, these fellows are better marksmen than you. They shoot a man better than you can shoot a hare."

He attempted to ride on, but the blood flowed so copiously that in a few moments he felt faint. He was taken from his horse and conveyed to the village of Rio-

Mayor. There he fainted away. There was an inclosed piece of ground near at hand; he was conveyed there and laid on a bank of turf. The chief surgeon of the army arrived and placed a first dressing on the wound. Junot fainted a second time while the bleeding was being stopped. On coming to himself he was observed to shudder. He had been carried into a churchyard, and the bank on which he was reposing was a grave!

The operation of extracting the ball could not be performed till next day. M. Malraison, the chief surgeon of the eighth corps, arrived to perform the operation. To his astonishment, he could not discover where the ball was. At length, after some search, it was discovered to have lodged in the round part of the maxillary bone of the left cheek. The bones of the nose were separated, but not broken. The aim must have been taken with singular precision. The ball had penetrated so deeply into the cheek bone that the incision produced by the pincers on the ball is still discernible.

When M. Malraison had discovered the ball, and was about to commence the operation, he asked Junot whether he would like the ball to be extracted internally or externally; the latter mode, he observed, would leave a scar on the face.

"Never mind," said Junot, when he was informed that there might be some doubt of the healing of the wound in the inside of the mouth. "A scar more or less is no matter to me. I shall even be vain of it."

After all, the wound, though its consequences were serious, left but faint traces externally. Junot was but slightly altered by his two scars; a slight protuberance on his nose was the principal disfigurement.

On the subject of Junot's wound, I must relate an anecdote highly honorable to Lord Wellington, and which shows his disposition in a most favorable point of view.

The French army was in full retreat at the moment when Junot received his wound. Desertions were very frequent among the French, and the nature of the country enabled the enemy to gain abundant information, while we were entirely cut off from it; so that the English perfectly well knew the state of our affairs, while we were ignorant of theirs, and even of our own. Lord

Wellington knew everything. He was aware of all the misfortunes which had assailed Masséna's army, and a scarcity of provisions was one of these misfortunes. This knowledge of our miserable condition prompted the Duke of Wellington to show to a man whom he esteemed, and by whom he was in his turn esteemed, a mark of attention which claims my deepest gratitude. He addressed to the Duc d'Abrantès, whose troops were almost touching his, the following letter:

«Sir:—I learn with great regret that you have been wounded, and I beg you will let me know whether I can send you anything that may be of use for dressing your wound or accelerating your recovery.

«I do not know whether you have lately heard from the Duchess. At the end of last month she was delivered of a son at Ciudad-Rodrigo. She left that place for Salamanca, and intended to proceed to France at the beginning of this month.» *

«I have the honor to remain, Sir, your very obedient servant,

«WELLINGTON.»

Junot gratefully thanked Lord Wellington for his kindness, but declined availing himself of the offer contained in his letter. As to what concerned me, he replied that he had heard of my accouchement. The fact is, he had known it since the 25th of December, the day on which Comte d'Erlon had joined Masséna.

The letter above mentioned is sufficient to explain the marked attention with which I received the Duke of Wellington on his arrival in Paris. Had Junot then been Governor of the Capital, assuredly the Duke of Wellington would have entered it only after passing over his body; yet before he drew his last breath Junot would have cordially pressed the hand of his noble and generous enemy.

* Considerations of safety, which it is unnecessary to detail here, led me to circulate the report that I intended to return to France at the beginning of January.

CHAPTER XVIII.

.The Spanish Nun and Marshal Duroc—The Nun's Sister and the Emperor—The Emperor's Altered Appearance—Description of the Young King—Napoleon at Play with His Son—His Conversation with Madame Junot—Rejoicings in Honor of the Birth of the King of Rome—His Christening—Maria Louisa's Accouchement—Madame de Montesquiou—Apathy of Maria Louisa—Anecdote—The Young King's Violent Temper—His Benevolence—The Widow and the Orphan—The Intended Palace.

THE Spanish nuns of the present day afford no idea of what monastic life formerly was. They lead a life of liberty, sometimes even of license. In fact, they enjoy, in too great an extent, the privilege of receiving strangers. With them the closura really exists only in name. The visit of a stranger never fails to excite their curiosity in an inordinate degree. As soon as I was installed in my habitation before described, the nuns came two by two and three by three to talk to me, and, as they expressed it, to keep me in good spirits. At first they amused me, but after a time I found their visits tiresome. One of them, who was exceedingly pretty, was less intrusive than her companions, though she appeared very desirous to talk with me. I asked her to come and pay me a visit in my apartment; but when she came I discovered that our conversation was likely to be brief. The pretty sister did not speak a word of French, and I knew only enough of Spanish to be able to give utterance to a few sentences. At first she was very reserved; but one evening when she came to see me, she seemed to pluck up courage, and she pronounced a name which almost made me leap from my chair with astonishment; I could not guess by what chance that name happened to be known in the interior of a convent. I looked at the little nun, who was called Santa Maria da Gracia, a name which she truly deserved, for she was a beautiful and graceful girl. When I fixed my eyes on her, she was as red as a rose, and the blush was the more becoming to her, inasmuch as she, like all the Spanish women, was naturally pale. But still the blush, pretty as it made her look, did not explain her question. I thought I might have misunderstood her, and I asked her what she said. She repeated it, and this time distinctly asked:

"Donde esta ahora el General Duroc?" (Where is General Duroc?)

"Why do you ask, sister?" I exclaimed, not a little surprised and amused at the question.

The nun put her finger on her lip, smiled, and showed me thirty-two beautiful pearls. Then she said in a whisper, and with a charming expression of confidence which showed that she saw I had understood her:

"Esta bien?" (Is he well?)

"Oh! muy bien—muy bien" (Oh, very well—very well!) replied I. And taking her hand I added:

"Es my amigo el General Duroc." (General Duroc is a friend of mine.)

The nun's pretty face was immediately lighted up with a charming expression of joy. Her eyes became more brilliant, and a bright smile played on her lips. She clasped her hands, and, half raising them, came and stood before me as if to get a better view of me. I was another being to her as soon as she learned that I was the friend of the man she loved. And yet for aught she knew I might have been her rival; I might have been Duroc's wife. But in the first moment of her joy, no such thought occurred to the warm-hearted Spaniard.

I learned no more from the little nun, but one of her companions afterward informed me that she made her profession only two months previously. She belonged to a good family in one of the provinces, and from her infancy had been destined for the cloister.

On the following day, when I again saw the nun, I asked whether she was aware that General Duroc was married. She nodded her head affirmatively, and without any appearance of chagrin.

"Su muger es Espanola" (His wife is a Spanish lady), added I.

At this information she appeared very much surprised. She several times raised her hands in token of astonishment, but still without any sign of vexation. When I left the convent, she gave me a little relic which I very carefully conveyed to France, and delivered to the person for whom it was intended.

When I mentioned this little adventure to Duroc, it was a long time before he could understand it; and no wonder, for my Santa Maria da Gracia, in her monastic habit, did not bring to his recollection a pretty little Spanish girl dressed in a fringed basquine, and a pink bodice embroidered with silver. However, by my description and the mention of her native place, he soon discovered her identity. I was much amused at the embarrassment which this little affair caused him. I promised him that I would be discreet, and I kept my promise.

"It is not for my own sake that I am afraid," said he.

"For whom, then?" inquired I.

"I will not tell you," said he.

"Well, then, if you will not honestly tell me all, I promise you that I will torment you about the little nun whenever we meet."

"For Heaven's sake, do not," he exclaimed; "I will never forgive you."

"Then tell me what I wish to know."

"I cannot, for it does not concern myself alone."

"Well, but since I have your secret, and have promised to keep it, surely I may be trusted with the secret of another. To a woman two secrets are no heavier than one. When once the effort of discretion is accomplished, one may carry it to any length."

He laughed and bade me farewell. But I executed my threat. Whenever we met, I whispered a word and made a sign which reminded him of Maria da Gracia. He was almost mad. At length he said to me one day: "Madame Junot, how unmerciful you are! What have I done to deserve this persecution at your hands? . . . But, tell me, did not Maria da Gracia's sister make any inquiry about the Emperor?"

"Ah! at length I understand you," said I.

I suspect that the year 1811 was very fertile in events of this kind.

On my return to France I found the Emperor much altered in appearance. His expression had acquired a paternal character. What a beautiful child was the young King of Rome! How lovely he appeared as he rode through the gardens of the Tuileries in his shell-shaped calèche, drawn by two young deer, which had been trained by Franconi, and which were given him by his aunt, the Queen of Naples. He resembled one of those figures of Cupid which have been discovered in the ruins of Herculaneum. One day I had been visiting the young King; the Emperor was also there, and he was playing with the child,—as he always played with those he loved,—that is to say, he was tormenting him. The Emperor had been riding, and held in his hand a whip, which attracted the child's notice. He stretched out his little hand, and when he seized the whip, burst into a fit of laughter, at the same time embracing his father.

"Is he not a fine boy, Madame Junot?" said the Emperor; "you must confess that he is." I could say so without flattery, for he was certainly a lovely boy. "You were not at Paris," continued the Emperor, "when my son was born. It was on that day I learned how much the Parisians love me; it is a cruel time for you ladies. I remember well the day that Junot left his home when you were going to be confined; I can understand now why he quitted you. What did the army say on the birth of the child?" I told him that the soldiers were enthusiastic during many days; he had already heard so, but was happy to receive a confirmation of their joy. He then pinched his son's cheek and his nose; the child cried.

"Come, come, sir," said the Emperor, "do you suppose you are never to be thwarted; and do Kings cry?" He then asked if the accounts in the English newspapers relative to my accouchement at Ciudad-Rodrigo were true. I replied that they were too silly to be so.

As soon as the King of Rome was born, the event was announced by telegraph* to all the principal towns in the Empire. At four o'clock the same afternoon, the marks of rejoicing in the provinces equaled those in Paris. The Emperor's couriers, pages, and officers were dispatched to the different Foreign Courts with intelligence of the happy event. The Senate of Italy, and the municipal bodies of Rome and Milan, had immediate notice of it. The different fortresses received orders to fire salutes; the seaports were enlivened by the display of colors from the vessels; and everywhere the people voluntarily illuminated their houses.

Those who regard these popular demonstrations as expressions of the secret sentiments of a people might have remarked that in all the faubourgs, as well as in the lowest and poorest quarters in Paris, the houses were illuminated to the very uppermost stories. A fête was got up on the occasion by the watermen of the Seine, which was prolonged until a late hour of the night. Much of all this was not ordered: it came spontaneously from the hearts of the people. That same people, who for thirty-five years previously had experienced so many emotions, had wept over so many reverses, and had rejoiced for so many victories, still showed by their enthusiasm on this occasion that they retained affections as warm and vivid as in the morning of their greatness.

The King of Rome was baptized on the very day of his birth—the 20th of March, 1811. The ceremony was performed at nine in the evening, in the chapel of the Tuileries. The whole of the Imperial Family attended, and the Emperor witnessed the ceremony with the deepest emotion. Napoleon proceeded to the chapel, followed by the members of the Household, those of the Empress, of Madame Mère, of the Princesses his sisters, and of the Kings his brothers. He took his station under a canopy in the center of the chapel, having before him a stool to kneel on.

A socle of granite had been placed on a carpet of white velvet embroidered with gold bees, and on this pedestal stood a gold vase destined for the baptismal font. When the Emperor approached the font bearing the King of Rome in his arms, the most profound silence prevailed. It was a religious silence, unaccompanied by the parade which might have been expected on such an occasion. This stillness formed a striking contrast with the joyous acclamations of the people outside.

Maria Louisa suffered a difficult and protracted accouchement. She was for some time in considerable danger. Baron Dubois went to acquaint the Emperor with this circumstance. Napoleon was in a bath, which he had been ordered to calm the feverish excitement under which he was suffering. On hearing that the Empress was in danger, he threw on his robe de chambre, and ran downstairs, exclaiming to Dubois: "Save the mother! think only of the mother!" As soon as she was delivered, the Emperor, who was himself indisposed, entered the chamber and ran to embrace her, without at first bestowing a single look upon his son, who indeed might have passed for dead. Nearly ten minutes elapsed before he evinced any signs of life. Every method to produce animation was resorted to. Warm napkins were wrapped round him, and his body was rubbed with the hand; a few drops of brandy were then blown into his mouth, and the royal infant at length uttered a feeble cry.

It is somewhat strange that so much doubt existed at the time of the birth of the King of Rome as to whether he really was a son of Maria Louisa. We have had in later times a similar challenge of the authenticity of the Duc de Bordeaux, Henry V. of France. But such is often the fate of heirs to thrones. Was there anything extraordinary that Maria Louisa at nineteen years of age, fresh and blooming, should become a mother after eleven months of marriage? and that this event should take place in the presence of twenty-two persons, actual eye-witnesses to the birth? I cannot conceive how persons of common sense could at the moment, and even since, allow their imaginations to work so in the face of impossibility!*

When the first gun announced that Maria Louisa was a mother, the most important affairs, as well as the ordinary occupations and duties, were one and all suspended; the people flocked to the Tuileries, hats were thrown up in the air, persons were seen kissing each other, tears were shed, but they were tears of joy. At eleven o'clock Madame Blanchard ascended in a balloon from the square of the École Militaire to announce to the people in the environs of Paris the birth of the son of the Emperor.

A multitude besieged the doors of the Palace for many days to read bulletins of the infant and of the Empress. The Emperor, on learning this, directed that a Chamberlain should be constantly in one of the rooms to publish the accounts of the Empress's health as soon as they were delivered by the physicians.

I have already mentioned the Emperor's fondness for his son. He used to take the King of Rome in his arms and toss him up in the air. The child would then laugh until the tears stood in his eyes; sometimes the Emperor would take him before a looking-glass, and work his face into all sorts of grimaces; and if the child was frightened and shed tears, Napoleon would say: "What, Sire, do you cry? A King, and cry? Shame, shame!"

The hours at which the young King was taken to the Emperor were not precisely fixed, nor could they be; but his visits were most frequently at the time of déjeuner. On these occasions the Emperor would give the child a little claret by dipping his finger in the glass and making him suck it. Sometimes he would daub the young Prince's face with gravy. The child would laugh heartily at seeing his father as much a child as he was himself, and only loved him the more for it. Children invariably love those who play with them. I recollect that once when Napoleon had daubed the young King's face the child was highly amused, and asked the Emperor to do the same to "Maman Quiou," for so he called his governess, Madame de Montesquiou.

The Emperor's selection of that lady for his son's governess was a proof of his excellent judgment. It was the best choice which could have been made. Madame de Montesquiou was young enough to render herself agreeable to a child, while she had sufficient maturity of years to fit her for the high duty which the confidence of her Sovereign had appointed her to fulfill. She was noble in heart as well as in name; and she possessed what the world frequently bestows only on fortune and favor—the esteem of all. She was indeed universally beloved and respected.

The attention she bestowed on the King of Rome during the period of his father's misfortunes would in itself be sufficient to inspire love and respect. Not only had she, from the hour of his birth, lavished on him all the cares of a mother, and a tender mother, but from the day when the unfortunate child was cut off from all his family, and deprived at once of his father and mother, Madame de Montesquiou devoted herself to him, for she alone was left to protect him. To accompany him she deserted country, friends, and family.

Madame de Montesquiou was not liked by the Empress, and the cause has never been satisfactorily ascertained. It has been said, by way of compliment to Maria Louisa, that she never did anyone an injury; yet she possessed an apathy of soul, from the influence of which the governess of her child was not exempt. And what sort of love did she show for her own child? I have seen Maria Louisa, when she was mounting or alighting from her horse, nod her plumed head to him, which never failed to set him crying; for he was frightened by the undulation of her feathers. At other times, when she did not go out, she would repair at four o'clock to his apartment. On these occasions she would take with her a piece of tapestry, with which she would sit down and make a show of working, looking now and then at the little King, and saying, as she nodded her head: "Bonjour, bonjour."

Perhaps, after the lapse of a quarter of an hour, the AUGUST MOTHER would be informed that Isabey or Paër were in attendance in her apartments; the one to give her lessons in drawing, the other in music. It would have been as well had she remained longer every day with her child to take a lesson in maternal feeling from the woman who so admirably supplied her place. But it would have been of little use—feeling is not to be taught.

Every morning at nine o'clock the young King was taken to the Empress. She would sometimes hold him on her lap, caress him, and then commit him to the care of the nurse. And how did she employ herself afterward? She read the papers. When the child grew peevish because he was not amused as his father used to amuse him, and cried at finding himself surrounded by serious and formal faces, his mother ordered him out of the room.

The public christening of the King of Rome took place on the return to Paris of the Emperor and Empress from a tour in the north of France. There have already been so many descriptions of this ceremony that it would be superfluous to enter into a fresh one. I will merely mention that the young Prince received names which show that the alliances formed by Sovereigns, the vows made at the baptismal font, the adoption by every religious formality and the ties of blood, are mere fallacies.

He was christened Napoleon François Charles Joseph! these are the names of his godfathers; they stand upon the register of his baptism, and they also appear on the tomb which closed over him at the early age of twenty-one. Who is there among us who does not recollect those days when he was still gracious and beautiful? There is a print of him which is now very scarce; he is kneeling, his hands joined, and below are the words: "I pray God for my father and for France." To the copy I have, the following are added: "I pray God for France and for my father;" lower down: "We now pray for Thee!"

One of the ushers of the Chamber with whom I was lately conversing wept like a child at his recollections of the young Prince. This man told me that the King of Rome one morning ran to the State Apartments, and reached the door of the Emperor's cabinet alone, for Madame de Montesquiou was unable to keep pace with him. The child raised his eager face to the Usher, and said: "Open the door for me; I wish to see papa."

"Sire," replied the man, "I cannot let your Majesty in." "Why not? I am the little King." "But your Majesty is alone!"

The Emperor had given orders that his son should not be allowed to enter his cabinet unless accompanied by his governess. This order was issued for the purpose of giving the young Prince, whose disposition was somewhat inclined to waywardness, a high idea of his governess's authority.

On receiving this denial from the Usher, the little Prince's eyes became suffused with tears, but he said not a word. He waited till Madame de Montesquiou came up, which was in less than a minute afterward. Then he seized her hand, and, looking proudly at the Usher, he said: "Open the door; the little King desires it." The Usher then opened the door of the cabinet and announced: "His Majesty the King of Rome."

A great deal has been said of the young King's violent temper. It is true he was self-willed, and was easily excited to passion; but this was one of the distinctive characteristics of his cousins; they almost all partook of similar hastiness of temper. I have known Achille Murat so violently overcome by strong passion as to be thrown into convulsions; and this when he was of the same age as the King of Rome. Madame de Montesquiou once corrected the young King for these fits of passion. On another occasion, when he was very violent, she had all the shutters of the windows closed, though it was broad daylight.

The child, astonished to find the light of day excluded and the candles lighted up, inquired of his governess why the shutters were closed. "In order that no one may hear you, Sire," replied she. "The French would never have you for their King if they knew you to be so naughty." "Have I," said he, "cried very loud?" "You have." "But did they hear me?" "I fear they did." Then he fell to weeping, but these were tears of repentance. He threw his little arms around his governess's neck, and said: "I will never do so again, Mamma Quiou! pray forgive me."

It happened one day that the King of Rome entered the Emperor's cabinet just as the Council had finished their deliberations. He ran up to his father without taking any notice of anyone in the room. Napoleon, though happy to observe these marks of affection, so natural, and coming so directly from the heart, stopped him, and said: "You have not made your bow, Sire! Come, make your obedience to these gentlemen." The child turned, and, bowing his head gently, kissed his little hand to the Ministers. The Emperor then raised him in his arms, and addressing them, said: "I hope, gentlemen, it will not be said that I neglect my son's education; he begins to understand infantine civility."

Young Napoleon was an amiable child, and he became more so as he advanced in age. I know many affecting stories of him, which indicate the goodness of his heart. When he was at Saint Cloud he liked to be placed at the window in order that he might see the people passing by. One day he perceived at some distance a young woman in mourning, apparently in great grief, holding by the hand a little boy about his own age. The child held in his hand a paper, which he raised toward the window at which young Napoleon stood. "Why is he dressed in black?" inquired the young King of his governess. "Because, no doubt, he has lost his father. Do you wish to know what he wants?"

The Emperor had given orders that his son should always be accessible to those in misfortune who wished to make any application to him by petition. The petitioners were immediately introduced, and they proved to be a young widow and her son. Her husband had died about three months previously of wounds received in Spain, and his widow solicited a pension. Madame de Montesquiou, thinking that this conformity of age between the little orphan and the young King might move the feelings of the latter, placed the petition in his hands. She was not deceived in her expectations. His heart was touched at the sight of the young petitioner. The Emperor was then on a hunting party, and the petition could not be presented to him until next morning at breakfast. Young Napoleon passed the whole of the day in thoughtfulness, and when the appointed hour arrived, he left his apartment to pay his respects to his father. He took care to present the petition apart from all the rest he carried, and this of his own accord.

"Here is a petition, papa," said he, "from a little boy. He is dressed all in black.* His papa has been killed in your service, and his mamma wants a pension, because she is poor and has much to vex her." "Ah! ah!" said the Emperor, taking his son in his arms; "you already grant pensions, do you? Diable! you have begun betimes. Come, let us see who this protégé of yours is." The widow had sufficient grounds for her claim; but in all probability they would not have been attended to for a year or two, had it not been for the King of Rome's intercession. The brevet of the pension was made out that very day, and a year's arrears added to the order.

Who can have forgotten the day when the Emperor took his son to a review in the Champ de Mars? How his features brightened with pleasure on hearing the joyous acclamations raised by his veteran bands. "Was he frightened?" inquired the Empress. "Frightened! no surely," replied Napoleon; "he knew he was surrounded by his father's friends." This expression of the Emperor produced an intoxication of joy amid the ranks of the soldiers.

After the review Napoleon conversed some time with the architect, M. Fontaine, on the subject of the Palace intended to be built for the King of Rome, on the elevated ground immediately facing the Military School. The word "Rome" brought to the recollection of the Emperor that he himself had never been in that city. "But," added he, "I shall certainly go there some day, for it is the City of my little King."

ON SAINT LOUIS'S DAY the Empress held a grand Court at Trianon. The Empress was very partial to Trianon, and the Emperor, always desirous to please her, ordered that the day of the fête should be celebrated there. Consequently, without regarding the inconvenience to which the ladies must be subjected in driving such a distance in full dress, the cards of invitation were issued for Trianon.

Madame Ney, the Duchesse de Ragusa, and myself were together when we heard of the intended fête, and the conversation immediately turned upon the difficulty of traveling four leagues and a half in our Court dresses.

"Well!" said Madame Ney, "I propose that we go to Versailles in our morning dresses, and take our Court dresses and our femmes de chambre with us. We can set out from Paris time enough to take a drive in the park, and as my husband and General Junot are here, they dressess or fatiguing ourselves."

This plan was too agreeable not to be approved of. The Duchesse de Ragusa, however, proposed an amendment which was also agreed to unanimously. She had an old friend named Ricbourg, who was formerly maître d'hôtel to the King, as well as I recollect, and who was now living at Versailles. He was the friend of the elder M. Perregaux, and had known Madame Marmont from her infancy. The Duchess proposed that we should dine at the house of this old gentleman, there dress, and proceed at once to Trianon. On M. Ricbourg being informed of our intentions he was delighted, for he was acquainted with us all.

Marshal and Madame Ney, Junot and I, the Duchesse de Ragusa, Lavalette, and the Baroness Lallemand all assembled in M. Ricbourg's dining-room on the 25th of August, 1811. We were all in high spirits, and sat down to an excellent dinner.

When we retired from table, Madame Ney told us that she had never been able to prevail on Ney to wear a full dress coat; but hoping that in our joyous party he might be a little less obstinate than usual, she had ordered the dress coat to be brought from Paris, together with the point ruffles and all the other accessories of a full Court costume. However, the difficulty was, not to bring the coat from Paris to Versailles, but to prevail on the Marshal to wear it from Versailles to Trianon.

"My dear," said Madame Ney, in her soft tone of voice, and stepping up to her husband timidly, as if she expected to be repulsed in the attack, "you know we have no time to lose. We ladies are almost ready. Does your dress coat require anything to be done to it?"

"My dress coat!" exclaimed the Marshal, with evident consternation.

"Yes, you know it is the Emperor's wish that you should all appear in Court dresses, and you must——"

"Nonsense!" said Ney; "do not talk to me of that masquerade foolery. I will never put it on to get laughed at, as I laugh at others who wear it."

"But, my dear Ney, it is impossible to go without it. The Emperor——"

This plan was too agreeable not to be approved of. The Duchesse de Ragusa, however, proposed an amendment which was also agreed to unanimously. "But, my dear Ney, it is impossible to go without it. The Emperor——"

"Well, if the Emperor wishes to encourage velvet weaving and embroidery, I am very willing to buy dress coats; but as to wearing them, that is another matter."

Madame Ney, hoping that ocular might be more effectual than oral persuasion, desired her femme de chambre to bring in the coat. But when the Marshal saw it, he was more resolutely set against it than before, and appealed to us all for our opinions. I must needs confess that the coat was not likely to be very becoming to Marshal Ney. It was of a light color and was profusely embroidered with flowers; and though in very good taste for a coat of the kind, yet it was perfectly natural that Ney should prefer his General's uniform. In vain did Madame Ney eulogize the coat; her husband was inflexible. At length, tormented by our importunities, for we supported the lady, as was our duty, Ney took the coat from the femme de chambre, and, taking hold of her arms, thrust them into the sleeves before the girl knew what he was doing. There stood the poor femme de chambre, for all the world like one of those wooden horses on which coats and cloaks are hung in the tailors' shops of the Palais Royal. Ney burst into a fit of laughter, and asked us whether we could seriously advise him to dress himself up like a buffoon on Mardi Gras. At this moment, Junot, who had finished dressing, entered in an extremely rich Court costume. On seeing him, Ney, angrily exclaimed:

"How! Is it possible that you submit to wear this harness? . . . Oh, Junot!"

Junot, like all present, was much diverted at this little scene. He told Ney that since 1808 he had frequently worn a Court dress. But nothing could induce Ney to make any concession. He was determined to go in his uniform, and the embroidered coat was folded up and deposited in a portmanteau, to the great satisfaction of the Marshal and the great discomfiture of his lady.

We arrived at Trianon, and shortly after we entered the gallery we were joined by the Comtesse du Chatel. We walked through the beautiful alleys of the gardens, the refreshing coolness of which was delicious, after leaving the crowded gallery. The Empress was making her round of the company, which prevented us from leaving our places. At length she approached our little coterie, and addressed a few words to each of us; to me she put her usual question:

"Is it as warm as this in Spain?"

When I had made my reply, and her Majesty had passed us, we withdrew to the fragrant alleys of the gardens, remarking among ourselves the difference between Maria Louisa and Josephine, who always had in readiness some pleasing observation, appropriate to the person to whom it was addressed. Maria Louisa seemed merely to ring the changes of one subject in different keys.

Soon after my return to France, I resumed my attendance on Madame Mère. She received me with the utmost kindness and affability. Her Household was more numerous than it had been when I left her, and the additions made to it were all excellent. Madame Laborde, then a most beautiful woman; Madame de Saint-Sauveur, daughter of the Prince de Masserano; Madame de Rochefort, the mother of Cardinal Bayane, had been appointed ladies-in-waiting to Madame Mère. The post of Dame pour accompagner Madame Mère was a most enviable one. She made us all happy.

One day a curious mistake occurred at the residence of Madame Mère, which made us all laugh very heartily at the hero of the adventure.

Madame was engaged to dine with the Queen of Spain. M. de Beaumont, her equerry, had gone to order her carriage, and Madame was sitting in one of the drawing-rooms with Madame de Fleurieu, who was that day lady-in-waiting. It was evening, and the room was but faintly lighted by the embers of the fire, when the two folding doors opened, and the valet de chambre ushered in a gentleman dressed in a richly embroidered coat, silk stockings, shoe buckles, having a sword at his side and a chapeau bras in his hand. The gentleman advanced into the apartment, bowed slightly to the two ladies, of whom he caught a glimpse in the twilight, then walked up to the fireplace, warmed his feet, hummed a tune, pulled out his watch, compared notes between it and the time-piece, and then said in a voice loud enough to be heard:

"What the devil is the old fool about? . . . Surely, his watch must have stopped."

Madame de Fleurieu knew not what to make of this; she was unable to guess what could have brought a Prefect (for she had descried the prefectorial embroidery on the gentleman's coat) to the residence of Madame Mère at that time of day, and especially when she was going out. The lady-in-waiting was about to ask him what he wanted, when he deliberately advanced to the sofa, and, addressing Madame, asked her whether his Serene Highness would be long making his appearance.

Madame, though generally very affable, was not always able to command herself. She had been surprised and annoyed at the intrusion, and finding herself addressed in this unceremonious way, she lost all patience.

"Monsieur," said she, "I must tell you . . . that——"

"Don't you understand me, madame? I ask you whether you can tell me when the Archchancellor will make his appearance."

The mystery was now more inexplicable than before. Madame de Fleurieu was struck dumb, and gazed in silent amazement at the gentleman. The latter shrugged his shoulders, and returned to his post in front of the fire, put his feet on the fender to warm them, and by turns whistled a tune, and muttered words which sounded very much like the imprecations of a hungry man.

Madame de Fleurieu, who thought it high time to put an end to this singular scene, rose from her seat, and advanced toward the gentleman with that air of courtly dignity which she so well knew how to assume when she placed herself in the first position preparatory to a courtesy.

"Monsieur," said she, "will you be kind enough to inform me where you think you are?"

The gentleman turned round with a careless air, still holding his foot on the fender.

"Where I think I am, madame? . . . I think I am in the house of his Serene Highness the Archchancellor

On hearing this, the gentleman, without being at all disconcerted, stepped up to Madame, and said:

"How happy I am! how can I express my gratification at thus having the opportunity of becoming acquainted with the mother of the man to whom I owe so many obligations." He then informed her Imperial Highness that his name was Desmousseaux, and that he was Prefect of Toulouse.

Madame, with her usual affability, received him with the respect due to a public functionary; but the clock struck six, and she said:

"Sir, I would advise you to lose no time. Half-past five is the Archchancellor's dinner hour. I cannot compensate you for the loss of your dinner, for I am myself engaged to dine with my daughter-in-law."

The Prefect took his leave. The mistake was no laughing matter to him. When he descended to the street, he found that the driver of his voiture de remise, after having set him down at Madame's door, which he thought was the Archchancellor's, had taken his departure without concerning himself about the fate of the Prefect. It rained, the wind blew violently, and the streets were covered with mud. Now, though the Archchancellor lived in the same street with Madame, yet the two houses were tolerably distant. The poor Prefect arrived, wet and splashed, and, worse than all, almost famished, for it was now half-past six o'clock. The Archchancellor had sat down to dinner, for he made it a rule never to wait, except for ladies or men of very high rank.

When Fouché was disgraced in 1810, the Duc de Rovigo was appointed to the office of Minister of the Police. The Emperor yielded, without being aware of it, to an intrigue which had been planned in the interior of his private cabinet. Cambacérès had vowed the ruin of Comte Dubois, a Councilor of State, who was then Prefect of Police, was at that moment leaving the Palace,* and about to step into his carriage. He heard someone call him, and on turning round he saw the Emperor in the balcony which fronted the window of his cabinet, calling and beckoning him to return.

"Dubois! Dubois!—come back immediately!" said he.

The Prefect was both astonished and alarmed at the agitated manner of the Emperor, whom he had left perfectly calm only a few moments previously. He of course instantly returned.

On entering the cabinet he found the Emperor alone with the Archchancellor. Cambacérès was as usual quite calm, but Napoleon was in a state of nervous excitement which rendered him incapable of knowing what he said or did. On his desk lay a sheet of paper, on which he had written a few lines which were perfectly illegible. He walked up and down for a few moments, then suddenly stopping and addressing himself to Comte Dubois, he said:

"That Fouché is a villain—a treacherous villain! He wants to treat me as he did his Convention, and his Directory, which he so basely betrayed and sold. . . . But I am not so short-sighted as Barras, and with me he will not find it so easy a matter. . . . He has notes and instructions of MINE, which I desire he will deliver up."

All this was uttered with great rapidity and violence.

"I know," added Napoleon, still addressing Comte Dubois, "that Fouché and you are not friends; but no matter—you must go to him, and execute an important mission—important to himself, for it concerns his life."

"Sire," said Comte Dubois, "may I beg to be exempt from the honor your Majesty is about to confer on me in my own hand! . . . When I demanded papers, which he would voluntarily have given he been an honest man, what answer do you returned to me? He said he had burned them. Fouché burn papers of importance!—no, no, he so simple as that! The fact is, he has now in his possession, and I insist upon his restoring You must go to his château at Ferrières, where is, and desire him in my name to surrender papers. . . . Should he refuse, place him in custody of a dozen gendarmes, and let him be the Abbaye. Par Dieu! I will show him that he have a speedy trial. . . . Well! why do you tate?”

“Sire, what papers am I to ask for? . . . Majesty should have a list of them . . . sup should give me ten, and he should have thirty.”

“You are right—sit down.” So saying, he Comte Dubois into the chair in which he had ting himself, and desired him to write on the sheet of paper which lay on the desk. He then to dictate, but with such rapidity that Comte could not follow him.

At length he threw himself into a chair, and said fact is, I can neither dictate nor write. Take incomplete as it is; it will answer your purpose the rest of the papers and I will afterward them—set off instantly.”

Comte Dubois procured post-horses, and started diately for Ferrières where he arrived before night found the vestibule and all the avenues of the house with packages and trunks directed to “Monsieur erneur de Rome.”

The Governor himself presently appeared, they were not to be eluded by any trifling; the Comte knew that his mission must be executed, and he felt himself under the necessity of pronouncing the word Abbaye.

No sooner had he uttered it than a livid hue overspread the countenance of Fouché, and Comte Dubois feared he would faint. His limbs trembled under him, and he threw himself into his armchair.

"The Abbaye! . . ." he exclaimed, "send me to the Abbaye! What does he mean to do? To bring me to trial?" He was in a painful state of agitation. The Prefect endeavored to calm him, and again spoke of delivering up the papers.

"But I tell you they are all destroyed . . . burned! . . . Do you think I would have kept in my possession papers which would not only have ruined me, but would have ruined my children, and my children's children, to the third and fourth generation?" And he paced about the apartment clasping his hands in a state of agony.

Comte Dubois pitied him, though he had always been the object of Fouché's malevolence. "Listen to me," said he; "I will do for you what I hope you would do for another in similar circumstances. I will tell the Emperor that you would not allow me to see the papers, and that Real has only to come here and break the seals. Real is, I believe, your friend. With the Emperor, it is only the first fit of anger that is to be feared. . . . When once he sleeps on his displeasure, there are seldom any traces of it remaining in the morning. Compose yourself, and all will be well."

He accordingly collected together a parcel of old unimportant papers; for, after all, there appeared to be no others,* and Comte Dubois, having sealed them, took that they were destroyed," said Comte Dubois. "Send another Councilor of State to Ferrières, for the business of my department will not permit me to go there every day. Your Majesty can send Real or anyone you please."

The Emperor consented to this. Real was sent to Ferrières, where he examined, and made a report upon, the papers sealed up by Comte Dubois. The result of this affair was the appointment of the Duc de Rovigo to the office of Minister of the Police.

The same cabal which had brought about the disgrace of Fouché caused the dismissal of Comte Dubois six months after. As to the Duc d'Otrante, his appointment to the governorship of Rome was almost nominal, and he underwent a sort of exile, until the moment when, for the misfortune of France, he again returned to the Ministry.

Projected Alliance between Great Britain and Spain—Comte Charles de Châtillon—Napoleon's Ideas Respecting the War in Spain—Taking of Montserrat and Valencia—Napoleon's Recollections at Saint Helena—Probability of French Supremacy in Spain—Confederation of the North—Embassy of the Duc de Vicenza to Saint Petersburg—The Duc de Rovigo—The Affair of the Duc d'Enghien—The Duc de Vicenza Recalled to France—General Lauriston Sent in His Stead—Fancy Quadrilles at Court—The Princess Borghèse and the Queen of Naples.

IN 1811 the English Minister for Foreign Affairs conceived the project of forming an alliance with Spain.

This was a bold but excellent plan, but not easy of execution, and Mr. Canning adopted the following scheme to insure complete inviolability of territory. Mr. Canning was the same Minister who had already proposed to Lucien to form a sort of league against France and the Emperor. The disaster of Moscow, however, obviated the necessity of attempting to execute Mr. Canning's schemes relative to Spain. As to Joseph, I think I may say with confidence that he loved his brother too well, and prized his own honor too highly, to accede to the proposition.

The Emperor had conceived singular notions respecting the war in Spain; he had heard the opinions of men well acquainted with the subject, and yet nothing could break the delusive spell which the hope of that conquest had thrown over him. Thus the mortification he experienced at a check was manifested in the reception which he gave to Masséna, and the gratification of a triumph was expressed in the reward given to Suchet. It was in allusion to the taking of Tarragona that the Emperor said: "Suchet—the Marshal's baton is in Tarragona," and Suchet gained it! The Emperor had greatly changed since the time when he commanded the Army of Italy. At Lodi, and at Arcola, he threw himself into the midst of the enemy's fire to induce his soldiers to follow him; now he threw a baton into the trench, and said: "Go and fetch it."

The brave Suchet, as an acknowledgment of the Emperor's bounty, immediately took Montserrat, a fortified mountain of which each hermitage was a redoubt, and every hermit a stanch partisan. The kingdom of Valencia next unrolled itself before the Army of Aragon. The port of Oropesa and its ancient walls were stained with the blood of Suchet. At length he arrived before Valencia and entered it victoriously. To Suchet the war in Spain was merely a military tour; and at his resting-places he planted the national flag on the Moorish or fera distant from Paris; he was absent during seven years. At the expiration of that time he returned to France, which he had left with the rank of a General commanding a division; possessing, it is true, a high military reputation, but still merely a General. When he returned he was a Marshal of the Empire, a Duke, a Colonel of the Imperial Guard, and Commander-in-Chief of the two armies of Catalonia and Aragon. Thus, when the Emperor saw him, he said: "Marshal Suchet, you have become a great man since I last saw you."

Napoleon said at Saint Helena, in those hours of captivity the langor of which he tried to divert by his recollections of past happiness: "Suchet was a man the vigor of whose mind and character increased wonderfully." All will admit that words pronounced on a deathbed have so solemn a character that the voice which utters them, however feeble, vibrates forever in the mind. The words I have above quoted were addressed to Dr. O'Meara, and as I conceive that the agonies of death commenced with Napoleon from the day when he set foot on Saint Helena, I regard every word he uttered on his rock of exile as that of a dying man.

Being questioned one day by Dr. O'Meara respecting his (Napoleon's) opinion of the generals whom he had left in France, he replied: "I give the preference to Suchet. Before his time Masséna was the first; but he may be considered as dead. Suchet, Clausel, and Gérard are now in my opinion the best French generals."* The "Memoires" of Madame Campan mention that Napoleon, speaking of Suchet, once said: "It is a pity that sovereigns cannot improvise men like him. If I had had two marshals such as Suchet, I should not only have conquered Spain, but I should have kept it."

The vigorous efforts made by Napoleon to maintain his Cortes assembled at the Isle of Leon, issuing every day contradictory decrees—the Council of Regency still disputing with the other authorities—those troubles which the heads of the new Government had not the power or perhaps the will to check; all this placed us in an advantageous position. King Joseph must have remarked it in his visit to Andalusia, the whole of which he journeyed through, and had ample opportunities of convincing himself that everywhere the people were weary of the war.

The Spaniards disliked the English, and were averse to any alliance with them. Consequently, in spite of the victories of Lord Wellington, our precipitate retreat, and all the misfortunes of the Arapiles,* the probability is that we might have kept Spain. The Spaniards themselves were of this opinion; hundreds of families returned to the mother country, and accepted office under the new Government; and, as was observed by a brave and patriotic Spaniard (Don Gonzalo O'Farrill), applicants multiplied to as great an extent as in the most peaceful days of the monarchy.

But when threats were uttered by the Emperor of Russia—when the Emperor Francis forgot that Napoleon was his son-in-law—when Prussia forgot all her solemn pledges of friendship and alliance—when, in short, the formidable league of the North began to count its legions to ascertain whether it was strong enough to resist France—then the ill feeling of the Peninsula was revived, and the little confidence which our troops had recovered was lost. England, foreseeing our disasters in the north of Europe, exerted herself, and increased her efforts in the Peninsula.

One of the columns of his Empire, on the stability of which Napoleon most confidently relied, was the Confed-

The whole of the year 1811 was spent in the interchange of fruitless communications. On the 5th of April the Duc de Bassano was appointed Minister for Foreign Affairs. On the 6th he addressed a note to Prince Kourakin to demand explanations. In his answer the Prince again spoke of the Duchy of Oldenburg. He might as well have talked of the dowry of Queen Mandane.* The Prince was asked what was meant by the army of 80,000 men who were assembling by order of the Cabinet of Saint Petersburg. The Ambassador, like a pacific man as he was, replied that the Duc de Bassano was probably jesting with him; that he knew of no army, and that such questions were very annoying to the Emperor, his master.

The cause of several of our misfortunes—I may perhaps say our greatest misfortunes—during the year 1811, may be traced to the embassy of the Duc de Vicenza to Saint Petersburg. This will not appear surprising when I relate the following particulars: Napoleon had sent the Duc de Rovigo to Saint Petersburg, not in the quality of Ambassador, but as Envoy-Extraordinary. The attentions which the Emperor Alexander had shown the Duke at Austerlitz and Erfurth led Napoleon to presume that he could not make a better choice of an Envoy. But it was necessary to think of an Ambassador.

The Emperor, who had his caprices like everybody else, attached great importance to external qualifications in making a choice of this kind. The Duc de Vicenza was a man of handsome figure and dignified deportment. His manners were as elegant as those of any man in France. He was noble by descent, and he had been ennobled by Napoleon. These considerations, joined to others which I do not pretend to know, caused the Duc de Vicenza to be appointed Ambassador from France to Saint Petersburg.

ject being alluded to in the presence of the Duc de L. he inquired what there was objectionable in t Ambassador, when he was informed that M. de C court could not be received in any house of Petersburg on account of the terrible affair of t d'Enghien.

Savary had his faults, but he also had merits in some measure counterbalanced them. He was Frenchman, and was sincerely attached to the Emperor. On hearing a charge aimed directly at his Master, which also implicated his comrade, he became indignant, and several warm altercations ensued between him and some individuals at the Court of Saint Petersburg. On one of these occasions he lost all self-command, addressing himself to a gentleman who had spoken in an offensive way on the subject in question, said, "You are mistaken, sir; the Duc de Vicenza had nothing to do with the affair of the Duc d'Enghien. It was I, who now have the honor of addressing you, who was the Prince to be shot." The person to whom these words were spoken stood almost petrified, and could not utter a word in reply.

On his return to Paris the Duc de Rovigo found M. de Caulaincourt preparing to set out on his Embassy, and he frankly told him the difficulties he would encounter, together with the cause in which they were originated. M. de Caulaincourt was alarmed, for though brave on the field of battle, he had not the spirit to face danger in private life. He thought of resigning his appointment; but that was impossible. He could he present himself to the Emperor and say, "Sire, I cannot go to Saint Petersburg, because I am accused of having DELIVERED UP the Duc d'Enghien to you?"

against him. No visit was paid to him; and when anyone was under the necessity of saluting him it was done as coldly as possible.

The Duc de Vicenza was too high spirited to submit to this sort of treatment. He appealed to the Czar himself and demanded justice. The Emperor Alexander expressed such violent displeasure against the offenders that he seemed ready to send the whole of his Court to Tobolsk. The Duc de Vicenza thought this was the proper moment for presenting his justification. "This accusation is the more painful to me," said he to the Emperor, "inasmuch as I am not guilty, which I can easily prove."

Thereupon he put his hand in his pocket and drew out the false document which he carried about with him, and presenting it to the Emperor, begged he would read it; but Alexander was more than satisfied. An Ambassador from Napoleon! a Duke of the Empire! a Grand Officer of the Crown of France was kneeling before him, and praying not only that he would protect him, but compel his subjects to show honor to him! The Duc de Vicenza did not comprehend the peculiar positions in which the Emperor Alexander and he himself stood; but the Czar was shrewd enough to judge them at a glance.

He profited by his advantage; he raised the Duc de Vicenza, and thought he could not do better than grant him his friendship. By securing a claim on the gratitude of Napoleon's Ambassador, the attitude of that Ambassador became a matter which he had control over. He therefore spared no efforts to conciliate the feelings of a man who could never have been induced to become a traitor. It was, indeed, with the most entire devotedness to the Emperor Napoleon that M. de Caulaincourt ruined the interests of his Master.

Alexander is much displeased even at the appearance of his distrust." His blindness was inconceivable to those who were ignorant of the plans which had been laid to corrupt, but to seduce him. When the Duc de V. presented to Alexander the pretended instructions of Berthier, the Emperor said:

"M. de Caulaincourt, I will not read them. I have since been acquainted with everything that can be known relative to the unfortunate death of the Duc d'Enghien. The Duke of Baden is my brother-in-law; his Court is in some degree, a portion of mine. You may therefore be certain that I know the truth of all that concerns you. I know your innocence. I affirm this on my word of honor, and I hope that pledge will be received." saying, he smiled, and presented his hand to the Duc de V. Vicenza.

From that moment M. de Caulaincourt was devoted to the Emperor Alexander. The latter was too adroit for it may be said too generous, to do justice by himself. What he had said in his cabinet he repeated publicly in his Court; and from that moment the affair of the Duc d'Enghien was never alluded to, except for the purpose of affirming the innocence of M. de Caulaincourt.

When the French Minister for Foreign Affairs addressed to the Duc de Vicenza a very urgent note relative to the assembling of the Russian troops, a petulant answer was returned, and these words were used: "I shall make no further reply to inquiries which appear to me to be absurd." Such was the course pursued by our Ambassador when levies of troops were being made in every part of Russia; when the Cabinet of Saint Petersburg was arranging the basis of a treaty with the Porte; when Sweden solicited and obtained the promise of Napoleon for her treason: when in short everything was floundering.

der, and to bring him to an explanation on the subject of the army. The audience was granted.

"M. de Lauriston," said Alexander, "I am much vexed to observe that seeds of discord are sown between the Emperor Napoleon and me; they can produce nothing but evil fruit. It is strange that I should be suspected of intentions so perverse as those which are attributed to me in France. I assemble an army, sir! Where is it? Eighty thousand men cannot be assembled in secret. If you will have the goodness to appoint officers who will serve as guides to mine, they shall go together to reconnoiter this army, which is said to be entering upon my territory without my knowledge, without the knowledge of my subjects. You must confess the thing is absurd!"

Lauriston was greatly perplexed on leaving the cabinet of the Emperor Alexander, and he wrote a most strange letter to France. He, too, was under the influence of a sort of fascination. The tone of irony, mingled with the confidence of the denial, left no room for doubt. This delusion was not of long duration; Napoleon had received positive information respecting the assembling of troops; but it was not until some time afterward that he was made acquainted with the treaty between Russia and Turkey.

The prospect of a new war cast a gloom over society in general, but particularly around the Court. It was in vain that the Emperor ordered balls, parties, and quadrilles. Maria Louisa was surrounded by young and handsome women, who were commanded by Napoleon to exert every nerve to render her gay; but these ladies had brothers, fathers, husbands, and lovers, so that the gayeties of the Court were forced pleasures. About this time a fancy quadrille was to be danced in the theater were encircled with gold bracelets, and the most beautiful cameos belonging to the house of Borghèse, which is known to possess the richest collection of gems. Her little feet were shod with slender sandals of purple silk, the bands of which were gold; at each point where the latter crossed on the leg was affixed a magnificent cameo; the sash which held the ægide on her bosom was of solid gold, and the center was ornamented with that most precious gem of the Borghèse collection—the dying Medusa. To all this splendor and magnificence, was added a short pike highly embossed with gold and precious stones, which she carried in her hand. She seemed a fairy apparition, almost without substance, something celestial.

Her sister, the Queen of Naples, represented France; but she was, indeed, a caricature when beside Pauline. Her figure was naturally inelegant, short, and rather stout; there was no grace in her dress, which was composed of a heavy mantle of purple and a long robe beneath. She wore also a helmet and plume of feathers; but amid all this assemblage of gold, of pearls, and rich ornaments, we still admired her pretty smiling and fresh face, shining in brilliancy, notwithstanding the grotesque confusion with which it was surrounded.

The same evening a second quadrille was danced, which was also extremely brilliant. M. Charles de La-grange, who was a very handsome man, an aid-de-camp to Berthier, was dressed to imitate Apollo; M. de Gals de Malvirade, first page to the Emperor, was a Zephyr; the charming Madame de Mesgrigni represented Flora, or Spring; Madame Legrand was to have personated Love in this quadrille, but her husband, the General, wrote to her on the eve of the gala day that she should not act the wily part of Cupid in the Court quadrilles. Madame Regnault de Saint Jean d'Angely, Madame de Rovigo, Madame Duchâtel, Madame Gazani, Madame de Bassano were very conspicuous among a crowd of elegant women who took part in these brilliant festivities.

IN THE meanwhile some curious scenes were passing in another quarter of the world. Henri Christophe was crowned King of Haiti, and a capuchin, named Corneille Brell, anointed him with cocoanut oil. In 1804 this same capuchin had anointed the Emperor Dessalines. The grand officers of the crown were entitled Duke of MARMALADE, Count LEMONADE, etc. The constitution of the kingdom of Haiti was copied from the French constitution of 1804. This parody on a great Empire and a great Sovereign gave birth at the time to many amusing pleasantries.

The French portion of Saint Domingo was, by the new arrangement of affairs, divided into two States on the death of Dessalines, the monster of the Antilles. The mulattoes wished to change the form of the government of Saint Domingo, and to establish a Republic with an elective President. Christophe was elected President of the Republic of Haiti for four years, and Petion, another mulatto, denounced him. Christophe then placed a crown upon his woolly head, and made toys of scepters and them that Napoleon would severely punish perjury. The Duc de Bassano had spent the whole of the past year in endeavoring to gain auxiliaries.

Austria, though our ally, seemed unwilling to oppose Russia. Prussia showed herself still less favorably disposed, and M. de Krussmarck, who was then at the head of the Prussian Cabinet, appeared unwilling to make any concession. Yet nothing was more important than to secure the alliance of Prussia; it was necessary that she should act with us or be destroyed. M. de Krussmarck plainly saw that Prussia was lost if France took only a cottage on her frontier. Accordingly, on the 24th of February, 1812, a treaty offensive and defensive was signed between France and the Cabinet of Berlin. With regard to Austria, she was our natural ally, but she was still more our natural enemy. We soon saw the fatal result of that alliance, on which the Emperor so confidently relied. Then Denmark and the Confederation of the Rhine: all were for us when the first trumpet sounded the signal for marching.

Junot had been taking the baths of Berèges, which had greatly improved his health, and he now earnestly solicited the Emperor to give him a military command. Napoleon sent him to Milan to take the command of the troops who were in Italy, and to march them toward the North. Junot was highly satisfied at this appointment, and left Paris at the moment when the treaty offensive and defensive was about to be signed with Austria. That treaty gave us a subsidy of 30,000 men and 60 pieces of cannon. Prince Schwartzenberg was to command the Austrian troops.

On the 26th of March, the same year, Sweden signed a treaty with Russia. A Marshal of France was about to set out on his new kingdom against his ex-

King John,* were, however, not accepted. To Sweden resolved to lend his aid in pulling the Colossus. This conduct was not very honorable.

He alleged in his defense that, on the 26th, General Friant had taken possession of Stralsund, a part of France, and had entered Swedish Poland in the order of the Emperor; but he did not acknowledge for ten months previously continual conferences taken place, and that he, Bernadotte, had rejected the arrangement that was proposed. England, she learned the defection of Bernadotte, hastily concluded the knowledge the treaty between Sweden and Russia, a convention which will prove to posterity that Napoleon might have fallen by the effect of his faults, yet treason and perfidy hurled him into the abyss on the brink of which he was now standing.

At length Napoleon departed for Germany to give his final orders, and to assemble all the forces which he was to march: he clearly saw that this campaign would be decisive, and that nothing could atone for an error. At this time Paris presented a curious but not a magnificent spectacle. Husbands, sons, brothers, and lovers departing to join the army; while wives, mothers, sisters, and mistresses, either remained at home or sought amusement in Italy, Switzerland, and the various watering places of France.

Before the firing of the first cannon the Emperor wished to make one more endeavor to ascertain the definitive resolution of Russia. M. de Narbonne, with all his courtly experience, had not been able to accomplish anything in his mission to Wilna. Napoleon placed his greater hope from an interview with the Emperor of Austria, now his father-in-law; and above all, from an interview with M. de Metternich. (The Emperor ing the path he had to pursue in the labyrinth was about to enter.

The wished-for interview, however, served only to create new difficulties, and these were increased by the outbreak of war between the United States and Great Britain. General Bloomfield, whose Headquarters were at New York, declared, on the part of the American Government, war against England. By a curious coincidence there could be no previous understanding in the matter, for the Emperor declared war against Russia on the same day (June 22d, 1812), at his Headquarters of War near Gumbinen, in Eastern Prussia.

At this period a circumstance took place which was but little noticed, because all eyes were directed to the great European Congress; I allude to the removal of the Spanish Royal Family to Rome, from Marseilles, where they had resided since the evacuation of Bayonne. My brother, who was then Lieutenant of Police at Marseilles, and who had the illustrious and unfortunate prisoners in some measure under his guard and responsibility, was well pleased at their removal, for Charles IV. had suffered in health from a sedentary life which he was forced to lead at Rome, while at Rome he might have the opportunity of pursuing his active habits and enjoying his favorite sports.

The Empress Josephine was a great favorite of the King and Queen of Spain. I have heard from a principal equerry that she was often the tutelary guardian of the unfortunate Royal Family, particularly during the Emperor's absence, their pecuniary allowances being very tardily paid. She used to exert her influence to make the requisite applications to get these allowances settled.

departure for Spain. This change was at once for the better and the worse. It imparted a more youthful appearance to her face; but her slender and elegant figure, which had been one of her principal attractions, had entirely disappeared. She was now decidedly embonpoint, and her figure had assumed that matronly air which we find in the statues of Agrippina, Cornelia, etc.

Still, however, she looked uncommonly well, and she wore a dress which became her admirably. Her judicious taste in these matters contributed to make her appear young much longer than she otherwise would. The Emperor, who seldom made remarks on female attire, except when a Court dress happened to strike him as having been worn too long, often noticed that of Josephine, of which he seemed proud. The best proof that can be adduced of the admirable taste of Josephine is the marked absence of elegance displayed by Maria Louisa, though both Empresses employed the same milliners and dress-makers, and Maria Louisa had a large sum allotted for the expenses of her toilet.

I have already mentioned that Madame Mère was very reserved in alluding to the Empress Maria Louisa. She observed the same rule with respect to her second daughter-in-law as she had observed toward her first; that is to say, she seldom spoke of her, and was always anxious to establish friendly feelings among her numerous children. In her relations with the latter, Madame Mère admirably maintained the dignity of her own position.

During the first few months of her marriage, the new Empress seemed to imagine that the only individuals of the Imperial Family worthy of her attention were Napoleon and the Queen of Naples. Madame Mère, whose excellent understanding pointed out to her the impropriforehead, replied: "Good heavens! I should not dream of anything else. I shall receive you as my daughter, and the Emperor's wife shall share the dinner of the Emperor's mother." The Empress Josephine was less attentive to Madame Mère than Maria Louisa, and in this she was ill advised. The Emperor did not externally show his mother much attention, but he was always deeply offended when he heard that anyone had slighted her.

I departed for Aix, in Savoy, on the 15th of June, 1812, accompanied by my friend Madame Lallemand, my brother-in-law, and my eldest son, the latter then three years of age. Aix was that year exceedingly crowded with company, and it was difficult to obtain a house. I was fortunate enough to find a very good one in the principal square. The Queen of Spain resided opposite to me, and was not so well accommodated. There were here some who had been or hoped to be Queens. The Princess of Sweden was expecting to be Queen; the Queen of Spain was exercising the right and title of Queen; Josephine had been a reigning Empress; while Talma was King of the theaters.

The Queen had but a very limited suite; she seemed anxious to avoid the least appearance of éclat. The Empress Josephine, too, had but few attendants. I forget who the ladies were who accompanied her; but I think Madame d'Audenarde was one of them. Madame Mère had brought only one lady of honor with her; this was Madame de Fontanges. I offered to resume my attendance upon Madame, though, in consequence of my ill health, my services had been dispensed with; but Madame would not hear of this.

Talma was among the visitors to Aix this year. He had gone thither by order of his medical attendants to drink the waters and recover his health, but though he

DUCHESS OF ABRANTÈS

This was all very well for a little time, when himself, tired of playing the Emperor, the Prince, the Grand Turk, seemed to be amused at taking any line of characters; but he soon grew weary of

"This will kill me," said he to me one day. "I cannot hold out much longer; she will compel me to do so, which I am sorry for, because I like the play, but I cannot endure the fatigue of those rehearsals every evening, for the Princess is learning the part of the 'École des Femmes,' and that of Angélique Femmes Savantes.'"

The Empress Josephine arrived at Aix before I did, and I had the honor to dine with her. At Aix there was a conspiracy formed to oblige her to leave France. An endeavor was made to induce me to join it; but I would not listen to any suggestion of the kind, and quitted Aix on the 28th of September to return to France. There symptoms of disquietude had begun to pervade the public mind. Intelligence of brilliant successes was transmitted from Russia, and the tenor of the private letters was of a very different nature.

At this disastrous period women were not exempt from the horrors of persecution. Madame Récamier had been exiled for having paid a visit to Madame de Staël at Coppet. The cause of her exile was too trivial for a woman like Madame Récamier, no less on account of the goodness of her heart than for her beauty, to shrink from its consequences. She went to Coppet, notwithstanding the warnings given by Junot and many other friends. She had scarcely reached her destination when she received notice that the doors of Paris were closed against her.

On the departure of Madame de Staël,

As soon as I arrived at Lyons I proceeded to the Hôtel de l'Europe, for I was aware that Madame Récamier lodged there. I was desirous of being as much with her as possible during my stay at Lyons, and, indeed, my journey thither had been undertaken chiefly for the purpose of seeing her. I cannot describe the painful nature of my feelings on entering a vast chamber, parted into two divisions by a screen. This was the only apartment occupied by Madame Récamier! She whom I had seen in her magnificent Hôtel in the Rue du Mont Blanc, surrounded by all the luxuries that wealth could procure, was now residing in an apartment at an inn, but still as beautiful, as cheerful, and as graceful as ever. She employed herself in acts of benevolence, and received the visits of a few faithful friends, who occasionally left Paris to spend some weeks with her. Among these friends were M. Adrien de Montmorency, the present Duc de Laval, Matthieu de Montmorency, Benjamin Constant, M. de Catelan, and some others.

When I entered, Madame Récamier was sitting at her embroidery frame. "Are you not dull?" said I, as I looked round her solitary abode. "Dull?" replied she, in her soft tone of voice. "I do not know why I should be so. I have various occupations to engage me; but sometimes, indeed, my unfortunate fate presents itself to my mind. Then I feel myself solitary, and I weep; for I will not boast of a stoicism that I do not possess. I could not be happy away from France!" All this she said with so natural an air, and looked so lovely, that I could not help turning to Madame Alexander Doumerc to ascertain what impression it had made on her. The looks we exchanged were expressive of profound admi-mon with you both! sing me a song; but let it be French, not Italian." Madame Doumerc requested me to accompany her in one of Boieldieu's romances, the words of which were written by M. de Longchamp when he was banished to America by the Directory. They are expressive of the deepest melancholy, and I could perceive they drew tears from the eyes of the fair exile.

I parted from Madame Récamier with regret. I wished to have stayed longer with her, but I could not. I was anxious to return to Paris to see my children again. My two daughters I had placed at the Abbaye aux Bois before I left Paris, as I could not safely leave them at my Hôtel in the care of their English governess, who was too young for such a charge. I found my family all well. I wrote to Junot to inform him of this; for he loved his children as tenderly as I did.

The Russian Campaign—Consequences of the Battle of the Moskowa—Kutuzow—Mallet's Conspiracy and Execution—Maria Louisa—Her Apathy on the Subject of Mallet's Conspiracy—Cambacérès—His Sharp Reply—The King of Rome and the Enfans Trouvés—Napoleon Imitating Haroun-al-Raschid—The Alabaster Shop in the Passage du Panorama—The Emperor's Loose Coats—Maria Louisa's Permission that He Should Dress as He Pleased—Mademoiselle L———The Medicis Vases—An Invitation to the Elysée Napoléon.

I HAVE already mentioned the fatal credulity of the Duc de Vicenza relative to the troops which the Emperor Alexander was assembling on the Russian frontier. General Lauriston was, fortunately, less credulous; still he became entangled in the inextricable labyrinth into approaching campaign, established intrenched camps at Thorn and Praga, as well as bridgeheads on the Vistula, the Bug, and the Narew, until finally the Battle of Friedland brought about the Treaty of Tilsit. I am aware that, in answer to these remarks, it may be said that in 1812 the army had nearly reached Moscow at a period of the year (7th September) when the cold is not severe; but was it not natural that Moscow, with a population of 400,000 inhabitants, would defend itself?

The victory of the Moskowa, gained by the talent and courage of Marshal Ney, proved as disastrous in its consequences as a defeat. What a fearful list of killed and wounded appeared after that battle! The Scythian Kutuzow, who had the presumption to declare that he had gained the victory, was rewarded by a title rarely given in Russia, that of Field-Marshal. Kutuzow, after all, might reasonably be excused for saying he had conquered an enemy whose loss was so much more disastrous than his own.

The carnage of that day was incalculable. I have been assured that more than one hundred and thirty thousand cannon were fired in the course of the battle. If we were conquerors, it was only for the vain honor of remaining masters of a field of battle strewn with the bodies of the dead and saturated with their blood. "That night," said Junot to me, "was one of the most horrible I ever passed! We had no provisions—the cold rain poured incessantly—we had no wood to kindle fires—and groans and cries of agony resounded on every side."

We entered Moscow, and in the meantime the Russian Army of Friedland landed at Riga. The Army of Moldavia gained Brese on the Bug. This latter force threatened to cut off our communications with Warsaw. We

There were at that time in Paris a number of malcontents, as there always are. The police had kept a watchful eye upon them; but for a time its vigilance seemed to have abated. In truth, since the retirement of Comte Dubois the police of Paris had been very indifferently conducted. Of this an event which occurred at the period here alluded to is an undeniable proof. In after-times it will scarcely be credited that in Paris one man, by his own unassisted attempt, was on the point of overthrowing the Government and establishing a new order of things neither wanted nor sought for, and that that man HIMSELF placed under arrest the Minister and the Lieutenant of Police. Yet all this really happened on the 23d of October, 1812.*

Mallet's conspiracy produced an agitation which was felt in the most remote provinces of the Empire. Maria Louisa was at that time at Saint Cloud. She showed no signs of alarm, but took her daily rides on horseback in the surrounding woods, which for ought she knew, might have been the haunt of conspirators. Only General Mallet and his two accomplices had been arrested, and it was at first believed that they must have confederates who would subsequently be discovered. This was not courage on the part of Maria Louisa; it was her natural apathy, and a disinclination to trouble herself about a matter which probably she did not very well understand.

"What could they have done to ME?" she said, with an air of hauteur, to the Archchancellor when he went to Saint Cloud to acquaint her with the affair. It seemed as though she meant to say: "I should like to know what they could have done to the daughter of the Emperor of Austria?" But the Archchancellor was not the man to be much overawed by great airs and high-sounding words, for he himself had sat in judgment on a King. And this same Francis II.—this same Emperor of Austria—had been twice compelled to fly before the arms of France.

Cambacérès, departing a little from that cool solemnity which seldom forsook him, replied rather sharply: "Truly, madame, it is fortunate that your Majesty regards these events with so philosophic an eye. You were doubtless aware that General Mallet's intention was to throw the King of Rome upon public charity; that is to say, in the Enfans Trouvés; and as to your Majesty, you were to be disposed of afterward." *

It is well known that Napoleon was fond of going about Paris early in the morning, accompanied only by the Duke of Friouli, and was always greatly pleased when he escaped being recognized.

About six o'clock one morning, in the month of March or April, he left the Elysée in company with Duroc. They bent their course toward the Boulevards, and on arriving there the Emperor observed that they had got out very soon, as all the shops were yet closed. "I must not play the Haroun-al-Raschid so early," said he; "besides, I believe it was always at night that he wandered forth with his faithful Giaffar."

When they arrived at the Passage du Panorama some of the shops were already opened. One of them particularly attracted the Emperor's attention. It was the celebrated magazin of Florence alabaster, which was kept then, as it is now, by M. L—— and his sister, natives of Switzerland. There was at that moment nobody in the shop but a formed her task, and after he had stood looking for some time, he said: "Ah ça! who keeps the house? Is there neither master nor mistress here?"

"Do you want to buy anything?" said the girl, depending her labor. Then, leaning on her brother, she rested her chin on her two hands, and stared at the Emperor full in the face, apparently half inclined to laugh at his eccentric appearance. Certainly it would be difficult to imagine a more comical figure than Napoleon presented in his Haroun-al-Raschid costume, as they called it. He wore the famous gray frock coat; it was not the coat itself, it was the make of it which rendered it so singular. The Emperor would never allow his clothes to be in the least degree tight, and consequently his tailors made his coats as if they had measured them upon a sentry box.

When he married Maria Louisa, the King of Rome prevailed on him to have his clothes made by his tailor. The Emperor wore them most courageously for some time, but he could endure the torture no longer and begged for mercy. He submitted the question to the decision of the Empress, who, as long as she could, rode horseback, and take four or five meals a day, was always good humored and willing to agree to anything; she therefore granted Napoleon full power to dress himself to his own fancy, saying that she liked the way he did AS WELL ONE WAY AS ANOTHER. Perhaps she would have spoken more correctly had she said SHE DID NOT LIKE HIM ANY BETTER ONE WAY THAN ANOTHER.

With the loose frock coat above described the Emperor wore a round hat, slouched over his forehead to prevent his being recognized. His unfashionable appearance, joined to his abrupt and uncereemonious manner, led his servant girl to conclude, at the first glance, that he was a moment came downstairs. On seeing her the Emperor was struck by her beauty and her elegant appearance; in truth, she might well have vied with the finest women of the Imperial Court. "Parbleu, madame," said the Emperor, touching the brim of his hat (for he could not venture to take it off, lest he should be known), "it would appear that you are not very early folks here. A good shopkeeper should look after her business better." "That would be very true, sir," replied Mademoiselle L——, "if business were going on well. But as it is, it matters very little whether we are in our shops or not." "Is trade, then, so very bad?" said Napoleon, examining various things on the counter. "Ruined, sir, totally ruined. I know not what will become of us." "Indeed I had no idea that France was in so pitiable a condition. I am a foreigner. I wish to make a few purchases, and at the same time I should like to learn from so agreeable a person as yourself some particulars respecting the state of business in Paris. What sort of vases do you call these?" "Those are the Medicis form," replied Mademoiselle L——. "They are very beautiful. What is the price of them?" Mademoiselle L—— opened once her ears and her eyes. The vases were marked three thousand francs. She told Napoleon the price of them, but he merely nodded his head, and then said, "Pray what is the reason that trade is so bad?" "Oh, sir, as long as that LITTLE MAN, our Emperor, is so much intent on war, how can we hope to enjoy either prosperity or happiness?" As she spoke these words Mademoiselle L—— threw herself into a chair, and the Emperor stood looking at her with the admiration which her beauty was calculated to excite. "Is your husband with the army?" inquired the Emperor. "I am not married, sir; I live here with my brother, whom I a-

Friouli to follow him. "That girl is very interesting," said he to Duroc, as they left the Passage du Panor. "When she told me she was a Swiss, I fancied I had before me one of the wives or sisters of the heroes of Reutly.* Do you think she knew me?" "I am confident she did not, Sire. Her manner was too calm and too self-possessed. She had no suspicion in whose presence she was."

The Emperor remained silent and thoughtful for a few moments, then, as if suddenly recovering from abstraction, he looked around him with an air of dignity. Duroc, who described the whole of this to me, said he was certain that some unworthy thought had for a moment crossed the Emperor's mind, but he had immediately banished it.

At eleven o'clock two porters, accompanied by a man in Imperial livery, arrived at the shop of Mademoiselle L—. The footman was the bearer of a billet, requesting that the lady would herself accompany the vases and receive the payment for them.

"And where am I to go?" said Mademoiselle L—, trembling, for on seeing the Imperial livery she began to regret the freedom with which she had spoken to her customer in the morning. "To the Elysée National," said the footman. The vases were fully packed and delivered to the porters, and Mademoiselle L—, accompanied by her brother, followed trembling like an aspen leaf; yet she was far from suspecting the whole truth. On arriving at the Elysée National, they were immediately ushered into the Emperor's cabinet. He took three bills of a thousand francs from his desk, and, presenting them to Mademoiselle L—, said with a smile: "Another time, mademoiselle, do not be so ready to murmur at the stagnation of out any fault being chargeable to the head of a Government. The LITTLE MAN, too, had grown wonderfully large in her estimation, not because he had purchased from her a pair of vases worth three thousand francs, but because he had forgotten a remark which many others in his exalted station would have regarded as an undonable offense.

A Chapter of Anecdotes—M. Hervé's Conspiracy—The Ladies' Honor and Their Diamonds—The Archchancellor—The Court House at Belleville—The Plot Discovered—Exile of M. Rostk—A Mystification—A Journey to Fontainebleau—The Empress's Displeasure—The Imperial Writing Paper—Examination of Her handwriting—M. Arbusson—M. Lavalette—The Real Offenders covered—Prince and Princess Louis.

HAVING in my last chapter said so much about the Minister and the Prefect of the Police, I will here relate an anecdote connected with the police which I omitted to insert at its proper date (1809), during the campaign of Wagram.

The Empress Josephine was at Malmaison, and the Emperor at Vienna. The Empress had with her a great retinue of attendants and visitors, and, with her accustomed amiability, she wished to see all around her cheerful and happy. One day she thought she observed Comtesse de Thalouet looking very uneasy and spirited. She inquired what was the matter, and the Countess replied "that she had something important to tell her, but that it must be communicated to respectability, who was happy in thus being enabled to save his Sovereigns from the danger that threatened them. The Comtesse de Thalouet introduced M. Hervé to the Empress Josephine, who, being naturally so lenient a ready ear to the story, and was so greatly interested that she resolved to communicate the matter to the Archchancellor, since M. Hervé had made no disclosure on condition that it should not be made to the police.

"If," said he, "the Minister and the Prefect of Police should be made acquainted with this affair, your Majesty, they will never forgive me for having been more vigilant than they in watching over the welfare of the Imperial Family; and they will take care to prevent the discovery which I am about to bring to light. The man, or rather the MONSTER, who contemplated this dreadful crime, has some confidence in me, but I have promised him the money requisite for carrying his plot into effect. Your Majesty is of course aware that I shall advance this money only for the purpose of catching him in the trap. But to do this, I must have considerable funds, and though I am rich, yet all my property is invested, and I cannot positively lay my hand on more than a thousand francs, while it is necessary to command at least three hundred thousand."

The Empress might as well have hoped to find the wealth of India, as three hundred thousand francs in her treasury in the month of July. Besides, she had no means of procuring money, for the Emperor had put every obstacle in the way of her raising loans. She called a council with her ladies of honor, and the result was that they presented their diamonds to the Empress, who begged she would dispose of them as she pleased. She was touched by this proof of their devotedness; and what to think. He resolved to go himself to M. Hervé's house at Belleville, which was represented to be the place of rendezvous of the assassin who was to annihilate the whole Imperial Family. M. Hervé, far from being disconcerted, expressed himself pleased at the Archchancellor's intention of making himself personally acquainted with the facts of the case. The Archchancellor, however, obtained no information by his visit. He was shown into a garden, at the end of which was a small door leading out to some fields, through which it was said the conspirator entered. M. Hervé explained the affair very cleverly, but the person to whom he explained it was more clever than he. Cambacérès thought the story suspicious. Moreover, it was an awkward affair, in whatever way it might be viewed. If true, it was necessary that the Government should immediately take cognizance of it; and if false, the dignity of the Empress was compromised. The Archchancellor said nothing to M. Hervé, but on his return to Paris he disclosed the whole matter to Comte Dubois. Hervé's house was surrounded, and he himself put under surveillance. It was speedily discovered that he had speculated to a vast extent in the funds, and had lost such large sums of money that he was on the verge of ruin. In short, M. Hervé was a second Latude, and he had speculated on the alarm he might excite in the Empress's mind; first for the Emperor, who was most dear to her, and next for herself and all the Imperial Family. The Comtesse de Thalouet, on whose fears Hervé had successfully worked, thought herself happy in being able to render the Empress so important a service as to make her acquainted with the supposed plot. All was going on well, when Josephine took it into her head to consult the Archchancellor. This was fortunate for herself. It saved a full confession. He was sent to prison, where he remained until the return of the Emperor, who treated the affair very lightly, and merely called it a hoax upon the gravity of the Archchancellor. M. Hervé was liberated, but he was exiled to Morlaix, and forbidden to return to Paris.

Another adventure, which happened at a later date, shows with what caution evidence, even apparently most positive, should be received, in a question which involves the punishment of any individual.

Comte R. de S—— and M. Carion de Nisas received letters from the Emperor's Chamberlain directing them to proceed immediately to Fontainebleau, where the Court then was. Comte de S—— was a country seat. He immediately set off in a calèche with six horses, and proceeded to Fontainebleau with the most speed. But in spite of all his haste, he did not reach there until after the arrival of Carion de Nisas, who, soon as he had alighted from his calèche, related to him an adventure which was not a little mortifying.

Carion de Nisas being in Paris when he received the letter, was enabled to reach Fontainebleau soon after Comte R. He arrived at nine o'clock in the evening, greatly fatigued by his journey, and having largely increased his postilions for the speed with which they had brought him. He hastened to the salon de service to find him eagerly as he observed an unusual bustle about the palace. The Chamberlain on duty, to whom he addressed himself, stared at him as if he had been speaking Greek, and at length seriously asked him what he wanted.

"Parbleu!" exclaimed M. de Nisas, "I want to see the Emperor."

"You have told me so already: but I repeat ried to Fontainebleau. The Chamberlain, after glancing at the writing, said:

"M. de Nisas, this is all a hoax. This letter is not my writing."

At that moment Comte R. de S—— arrived, and, far from clearing up the mystery, only helped to render it the more obscure.

"But, at any rate, I will pay my respects to his Majesty," said he; "that is a privilege which I am always happy to exercise."

"No doubt of that," said the Chamberlain (M. de Tournou); "but unluckily there is a little obstacle in the way of your doing so now. The Emperor set off this morning at four o'clock."

"Set off!" exclaimed the two mystified visitors with one voice; "and pray where is he gone?"

"To Italy," replied the Chamberlain. They had now no alternative but to return to Paris, and some days elapsed before they heard any more of the matter.

In the meanwhile, the Emperor, who daily received by estafette intelligence of all that was doing at Court, heard of the hoax, and was greatly displeased at it. The Prefect of the Police received strict orders to discover the individual who had dared to use the name of a great civil officer of the Crown, and also to inquire among the individuals of the Imperial Household how it happened that the writing paper appropriated to the Emperor's private use should have been procured for the purpose of playing a trick.

It happened that the paper on which the forged letters had been written was of a peculiar manufacture; it had a cipher different from that of any other paper. This matter demanded investigation. The natural conclusion was that it had been abstracted from the Emperor's cab-handwriting, employed by the Criminal Court, and laid before them the letters produced by the paper maker, together with the two letters which had been sent to Comte de S—— and M. Carion de Nisas. The result of the examination was that, of the letters produced by the paper manufacturer, there was one the handwriting of which corresponded with that of the two hoaxing letters. The letter in question was from M. Arbusson, a member of the Council of State.

M. Arbusson was a steady, respectable old gentleman, whose appearance was truly patriarchal. On finding himself arrested, he was perfectly dismayed, and on learning the offense with which he was charged his astonishment was mingled with indignation. He pointed to his gray hairs, and asked whether at his time of life he was likely to be playing tricks which would scarcely be pardonable in a young page. He was shown the hoaxing letters, together with his own, and was informed that on a careful examination of the handwriting he was declared to be the culprit, and that the Emperor had sent a formal order for his arrest. M. Arbusson was confounded; but as he knew himself to be innocent, he made up his mind to endure the annoyance, and wait till the mystery should be cleared up.

Meanwhile M. Arbusson's arrest, and the extraordinary cause assigned for it, created a considerable sensation in Paris. He had many friends who went immediately to see him, and who felt great interest in the affair. Among the number was Lavalette, who was ever ready to exert himself to serve his friends. After a vast deal of troublesome investigation, he succeeded in tracing out the real offenders.

"Give me two hours," said he; "I think I can convince you of your mistake; but at this moment I am not fool's errand to Fontainebleau. As the Emperor was gone, they hoped to keep the joke entirely among themselves, for they expected to arrive at Fontainebleau in time to desire the Chamberlain on duty not to show the letters, but to burn them. The affair, however, turned out more seriously than they anticipated; for poor M. Arbusson was conveyed to the office of the Prefect of Police, and they themselves incurred the deep displeasure of the Emperor. M. Arbusson was immediately conducted home, and M. de Lavalette suspended his report to the Emperor until the Prince and Princess had time to frame an excuse for themselves. Napoleon did not very readily forgive tricks of this sort, particularly when his name was mixed up with them.

Burning of Moscow—Discouragement of the French Army—The Retreat—Napoleon on His Return to France—His Narrow Escape from a Party of Cossacks—His Arrival at Warsaw—The Abbé de Pradt—Napoleon's Interview with the King of Saxony at Dresden—His Arrival at the Tuileries—The Emperor's Peculiarities of Feeling—General Kutuzow and General Morosow—Bravery of Marshal Ney—Horrors of the Retreat—Junot's Wounds—General Duroc's Sympathy—Berthier Plays the Sovereign Prince—Junot and Prince Eugène—Correspondence between Berthier and Junot.

THE news which reached us from the Army of Russia was as scarce as it was discouraging. No letters passed; we were deprived even of that consolation which is so soothing to absent friends. Such was our painful situation in the years 1812 and 1813. At that time the first rumors reached Paris of the burning of the Holy City with her forty times forty cupolas; when the greater part of that army, surprised in the midst of security, saw that a return home was almost impracticable, then a fatal discouragement took possession of those brave men who had so often faced the most formidable dangers. Too soon our reverses began to assume a more decided aspect. In vain did the Emperor endeavor to conceal the real state of affairs by pretended confidence, and by issuing decrees respecting the theaters, dated from Moscow. Nothing could prevent the truth reaching the army; and nothing could prevent its coming to us, notwithstanding our distance from the scene of the terrible drama.

Kutuzow, wishing to prevent the junction of Marshal Victor, attacked the King of Naples at Winskowo, and defeated him in spite of his obstinate and courageous defense. Napoleon then determined on his retreat. Thus, the whole of Europe in arms—more than a million of men slaying each other—a capital burned and ravaged—widows and orphans weeping—graves opening to receive those who fell, even as they set foot on their native soil—all this tragedy was at length terminated by a calamitous retreat. After forty days' occupation Napoleon abandoned Moscow—Moscow which he expected to see in all her Muscovite and Gothic glory, with her Oriental wealth, her gardens, her cupolas, and her roofs of gold, her palaces, and her bazaars: all these he found buried beneath a heap of ashes.

Napoleon had determined on his return to France amid all the disasters of the retreat. He first mentioned his intention to Duroc. "If you had heard him," said the Duke of Friouli when relating this conversation to me, "you would have admired him more in this than in any other circumstance of his life." Napoleon next the Governor of Wilna, whom he ordered to make every possible exertion to collect provisions and ammunition in the last-mentioned town. "I SHALL HAVE MORE WEIGHT on my throne at the Tuileries than at the head of the army," said he to the few persons who were near him at the moment of his departure; and he was right.

On the following night he had a narrow escape at Ochsmiana. This was a small town, half fortified, and occupied by a body of Königsberg troops. On the Emperor's arrival a party of Cossacks, who entered the town by surprise, had just been repulsed. It was by a mere chance that the Emperor was not taken.* On his arrival at Wilna, Napoleon stopped a short time to see the Duke of Bassano, for whom he entertained a most sincere friendship and esteem. He asked the Duke some questions respecting the condition of Wilna, then a point of the utmost importance to the army. At Warsaw, where he arrived at one in the afternoon, he would not alight at any private house. He went to the Hôtel d'Angleterre, and immediately sent for M. de Pradt, who had been dispatched to Warsaw to collect information and draw up reports on the state of the country. M. de Pradt remained for some time with the Emperor in a little parlor on the ground floor of the Hôtel d'Angleterre, for Napoleon would not allow any other apartment to be prepared for him.†

Nine days after his departure from Smorgony, Napoleon was at Dresden, where he had a short interview with the King of Saxony. From Dresden he proceeded to Erfurth. There he left his sledge, and got into the traveling carriage of M. de Saint Aignan, the Minister from France to the Duke of Weimar, and brother-in-law of the Duke of Vicenza. He afterward passed through all the towns on the frontiers; and on the 19th of December, a quarter of an hour after midnight, he arrived before the front gate of the Tuileries. Since Mallet's conspiracy unusual vigilance had been observed by the police of Paris and the sentinels of the Palace. The Empress was about to retire to bed when the Emperor's calèche stopped at the gate.

The Guard did not at first recognize him in the little vehicle in which he was seated with the Duke of Vicenza, who after a fortnight's tête-à-tête escorted the Emperor to the door of Maria Louisa's chamber, and then hastened to take that repose of which he stood so greatly in need. Before daybreak on the following morning (the 20th of December) the cannon of the Invalides announced to the City of Paris that the Emperor had returned. I was then too unwell to go to the Tuileries, but I dispatched my brother thither, as I was very anxious to have intelligence of Junot. Albert on his return informed me that the Emperor's levee had never been so splendid nor so numerous. As to Napoleon himself, he was perfect, sympathizing in all the anxiety which prevailed, and in the most touching manner soothing the fears of fathers and brothers who came to obtain intelligence of their relatives.

Napoleon, like all sovereigns, felt a pride in being beloved. Yet it is strange that in general he never thought of conferring any but worldly recompenses on the men who were most sincerely devoted to him; as if a single kind word, coming from the heart, would not have repaid such men better than a rich principality such as he conferred on Davoût, who was not on that account the more attached to him. On these subjects the Emperor had singular ideas; and yet, at the time to which mask and to conceal from her the cloud which would sometimes gather on his brow; "for," thought he, "she may write to her father; and the Austrian family, who hate me, would rejoice to learn that I have my turn of uneasiness and fear."

While Napoleon was dejected by the first frowns with which fortune had visited him, the Russians were triumphantly chanting their songs of victory. Overjoyed at an event which they had no reason to look for, and which was indeed almost the effect of chance, they did not even see the sacrifice at which their success had been purchased, nor the fragile base on which it stood. Muscovite vanity was reluctant to acknowledge that THE WEATHER had had a large share in their victory; though it was a general remark among the common people in Russia that it was not General Kutuzow, but General Morosow,* who had destroyed the French army.

Junot was deeply affected whenever he spoke of the disasters of the Russian campaign, and he never liked any person to question him on the subject. When we were alone together he allowed himself to give way to the profound melancholy which took possession of him—and then he spoke to me in confidence of what he had seen. One day, at breakfast, he read a long paragraph in the "Moniteur," describing the return to France of part of the troops from Russia. He threw the journal from him with a bitter smile, accompanied by a sort of imprecation.

"Is it not unworthy of the Emperor," said he to me, "to endeavor to conceal from the nation the extent of her loss; and, after all, how is the truth to be concealed? Here is this journal speaking of troops arriving at Mayence on their return from Russia!" At this he shrugged his shoulders. "Of the four hundred thousand men who made us tremble. Women and children were driven by the lances of the Cossacks into the freezing water of the river; the bodies of the slain were crushed beneath the wheels of the fourgons in which useless riches had been stowed; females were captured by the Cossacks and exposed to every sort of outrage; children stripped and thrown naked upon the snow—shrieks and groans mingled with roaring of the cannon; and while the wrecks of the army hurried across the bridges, thousands fell into the river without the possibility of being rescued! Twenty thousand prisoners were taken—the treasures of Moscow were wrested from us, and we lost one hundred and fifty pieces of cannon. In short, we were in our turn plundered—and ignominiously, like vile brigands!

Junot said that if General Kutuzow had not allowed the French to gain two marches upon him, and if General Wittgenstein had not committed some egregious faults, our army must have been utterly destroyed, either at the passage of the Beresina, or more especially at the affair of Kowno, or at the passage of the Niemen. In the retreat from Russia, Ney distinguished himself as he had previously done in the famous retreat in Portugal. He was always the last to retire, and the foremost to face the enemy, and to animate the drooping courage of his troops; in short, he himself was worth more than ten battalions. But in the waters of the Niemen were engulfed, in spite of the supernatural efforts of the hero, the wreck of the finest army that France ever arrayed against her enemies.

Junot suffered dreadfully from his wounds after his return from Russia. The last wound in particular, which he had received in Spain in the winter of 1811, had given him a severe shock. To this was added a return of pain from another wound which he had received in Italy (at Lonato), which had laid the skull open, and had Duroc, and General Valence. I had observed that latter showed a very sincere regard for Junot, especially since his return from Russia. I felt grateful to him for this, and I was much gratified by the circumstances which his friendship was grounded. I learned it from Duroc. On the day when we were all assembled together as I have mentioned above, M. de Narbonne was announced. He had arrived only a few hours before, and hastened immediately to visit one of his dearest friends. Junot flew to him, embraced him, and then, conducting him to me, said:

"Here is not only a friend, but a noble brother-in-law, and he shook him cordially by the hand.

M. de Narbonne expressed his concern for the state of health in which he saw me, and observing that we were none but friends with us, he again pressed Junot's hand and appeared to question him by his looks, not knowing whether I had been made acquainted with what had passed between the Emperor and Junot.

"It is just the same, my dear friend," said Junot, "your countenance at the same time changing*" "Yes, I suffer here as I suffered when I was there, and perhaps more acutely."

He laid his head upon my shoulder, and dropped a tear. Oh, what were my feelings at that moment! Never since we had been married had I seen Junot shed a tear but once, and that was under the most distressing circumstances. I therefore knew well how much he was suffering.

"Junot, Junot!" said Duroc, in a loud tone of voice, "you are unjust to the Emperor. He loves you. I can swear that he loves you as steadfastly as he has ever loved you! Ask Madame Junot, who has seen him often long since. Tell him then that he is in the wrong," added Duroc, evidently impatient at my silence.

"Junot!" exclaimed M. de Narbonne, "I must say with Duroc that you are unjust. The Emperor loves you. In the name of Heaven, whom does he love if he does not love you—you, the oldest of his friends? I say you are unjust to him."

"And do you tell me this?" rejoined Junot, "you who have been witness of what he did for Rapp, when he wished to give him my army corps? If he did not give it, it was because Rapp was too noble-minded to accept the spoil of a friend. But the Emperor wished to take from me those soldiers whom I had led to the cannon's mouth at the battle of the Moskowa. He would have deprived me of the means of acquiring glory. And who could have dared to attempt this, but he who can attempt all? No, no, I am not unjust! Napoleon no longer loves me, and if I may venture to tell you so, he no longer loves us."

Junot was greatly excited as he uttered these words. His handsome countenance expressed the wounded feelings of a generous heart. His friends remained silent, but it was evident that they all sympathized with the old friend who had been looked coldly on in the moment of affliction, and repelled as troublesome when he sought, not for places, cordons, or favors, but for one kind word.*

"My dear Andoche," I at length said, "it is your duty to speak to the Emperor. I have already told you so often, and I again repeat it. I believe that if the Emperor were aware of all that you suffer, he would not only eagerly repair the injury he has done you, but that he would do so in a marked way."

Duroc said nothing; but Albert, M. de Narbonne, and General de Valence, all declared that I was right, and that Junot ought to do as I advised him. At that

"Do you imagine that I have not done what you suggest? Do you think, then, that I have been thus stricken to the heart without at least defending myself? Duroc well knows that I have written; he also knows what answer I have received."

Junot's features here assumed a fearful expression—an expression which, alas! I could afterward easily account for. Duroc advanced to him, and took his hand, which he pressed.

"You distress me greatly, Junot," he said. "Be comforted. Compose yourself for her sake;" and he pointed to me.

"She shall see what I have done," resumed Junot. "I wish also that my brother and Comte de Narbonne should know it."

He went to his own apartment, and speedily returned with a portfolio, containing many letters. Some of these letters were from the Emperor. I recognized the handwriting. This astonished me, because I knew that Junot kept all the Emperor's letters in a small box of sandalwood richly mounted in gold. This box had belonged to Mourad Bey. Junot brought it from Egypt, and from the moment he became possessed of it, he appropriated it to the purpose of containing Napoleon's letters, of which he had at that period a great number. I therefore never thought of asking him for this box, although I much wished for it. The box itself was, moreover, inclosed in a beautiful case made for it by Jacob, and it was kept in Junot's bedchamber.*

Junot then seated himself by my sofa, and taking several of the papers from his portfolio, he said:

"A few months before the bulletins appeared I had some explanations with Berthier, relative to a matter which then concerned me. It was on the subject of the arrangement did not suit me, and I protested against it. The answers which I received betrayed a change of sentiments of the Emperor. I wrote to Duroc on the subject. You recollect it," said he, addressing me directly to Duroc.

The latter nodded his head affirmatively, and continued:

"The Emperor was then at Dresden. Here is his letter; it is official in every word. Berthier still plays the sovereign prince to his old comrades. Junot shrugged his shoulders; Comte de Narbonne smiled. Duroc smiled.

"To the Duc d'Abrantès.

"MONSIEUR LE DUC:

"I have to acquaint you that the Emperor has received your letter. I have also received that which you had addressed to me. M. de Contrégise. You are mistaken in supposing that the Emperor has shown you any slight. His Majesty KNOWS TOO WELL YOUR ATTACHMENT TO HIM, AND HOW VERY USEFUL YOUR BRAVERY IS ON THE FIELD OF BATTLE. You have misunderstood the order which has been given for I informed you that you would remain under the orders of the Emperor to command several divisions. But, that the matter might be left in any uncertainty, I will make you acquainted with the intention of his Majesty. You will retain the rank of second in command of the 4th corps, under the orders of the Prince Viceroy, who commands the central corps of the center. But the 4th corps being a part of the Army of Italy, and formed by the Viceroy, it is the Emperor's wish that the chief of that corps should be at the same time the Staff of his Imperial Majesty. His Royal Highness, as Commander of several central corps of the Army. You are therefore, in fact, the Commander of the 4th corps under the orders of the Viceroy. The Emperor reposes every confidence in you. His Majesty loves you—and for myself, I know enough to feel persuaded that this assurance will dispel the uneasiness which you appear to have labored.

"ALEXANDER

"Prince de Neuchâtel

"DRESDEN, 28th May, 1812.

"MY DEAR DUC D'ANGULÊME.

"Why do you make yourself unhappy without reason? The Emperor's attachment to you is unabated. You are now on the field of battle, where he will be enabled to appreciate his true friends. We are of that number. The Emperor has no wish to offend you. You remain with the 4th corps, as Commander of that corps, under the orders of the Viceroy. It is the Emperor's desire that the Staff of that corps shall be the Staff of the Viceroy, who is the Commander of several corps. You have, then, that which is preferable, viz, the military command of the 4th corps. This arrangement is made only with a view to economy by making one Staff less. The 4th corps has come from Italy, and was formed by the Viceroy—and it is natural that the Staff of that corps should be his Staff rather than that of the Bavarians—that is to say, the Chief General Staff.

Set your mind at rest. The Emperor, in the conversation which he has had with me, has more than ever convinced me of the confidence he reposes in you. GENERAL JUNOT LIVES IN HIS HEART—HE HEARS OF AND HIS FORMER SERVICES—HE HOPES TO HAVE THEM RENEWED.

"A thousand compliments, my dear Duke,

"FROM YOURS,

"ALEXANDER."

In spite of the assurances contained in the above letter Junot still entertained some unpleasant feelings on the affair of Prince Eugène, and he again wrote to Berthie on the subject. Notwithstanding the friendship which Junot cherished for Prince Eugène, he could not forget that ten years previously he had seen him a young Colonel in his father-in-law's Guard. Prior to that time Junot had entertained for Eugène a sort of patronizing friendship, such as might naturally be extended to a promising young officer, by a man of Junot's high military rank and reputation. All this was matter of such recent date that it could scarcely be expected that Junot should bow his scarred forehead to the young “WILNA, 6th July, 1812.

“MY DEAR DUC D’ABRANTÈS:

“I have spoken of you to the Emperor, who considers it useless for you to come here. His Majesty expects to depart hence every moment, and your corps will move to-morrow morning.

“Continue to command the 4th corps. The Emperor does not wish to form a new Staff for the Viceroy, but desires that he should have the Staff of the 4th corps. The EMPEROR ESTEEMS YOU. DO NOT TORMENT YOURSELF. BE PATIENT. HIS MAJESTY KNOWS YOUR SITUATION—HE WILL TAKE IT KINDLY OF YOU TO RETAIN IT. You will fight at the head of the 4th corps. Is not that the principal consideration?—Is not that being really the Commander?—Accept my remembrances, my dear Junot. The Emperor will soon take this matter into consideration, and everything will be arranged to your satisfaction, “Accept every assurance of my friendship.

CHAPTER XXV.

Junot's Letter to Me—The Battle of the Moskowa—The Wounded—Marmont—The Bear in a Pie—Junot's Bad State of Health—He Applies for Leave of Absence—Loss of His Baggage—Junot and Bonaparte at Marseilles—The Bulletins—Junot Solicits Leave to Go to the Emperor at Moscow—Receives Orders to Proceed to Moladitchno—His Answer to Berthier—His Letter to the Emperor—The Report of the King of Naples—The Battle of Smolensko—Duroc—His Forebodings—Blamable Conduct of Murat.

AFTER Berthier's letter dated from Wilna, Junot became more easy in his mind. I received a letter from him dated from Mojaïsk; it was written in a cheerful tone, and he spoke almost jokingly of the climate and the cannon balls of the Russians. I subjoin this letter. It is curious, inasmuch as it shows how easily Junot was impressed with anything which came very well, I may even say better than ever. This morning I made a breakfast that might have served for four. I was with Desgenettes, who was dying of hunger, and with whom I drank your health. He is very well, and I beg you will inform his wife of this.

"The advanced guard of the Russian army is at most ten leagues from Moscow. It is said that the Russians wish to give us battle once more. Be it so. We are ready for them whenever they please.

"The Emperor was very well pleased with the conduct of my army corps at the great battle. The troops, certainly, performed miracles. I never in my life witnessed such a storm of bullets, grapeshot, bombs, etc. All my staff officers who were round me have been, without exception, killed or wounded. Poor Lagrave is killed!* Alexander has had two horses wounded by cannon balls. As to me, I remained unharmed in the midst of all these dangers; I never even had occasion to move or dismount from my horse: and here I am well.

"You are, of course, in Paris at present, in the midst of your children, and I am here surrounded by upward of three thousand wounded men, Russians, French, or Allies. It is a frightful spectacle. Rapp, Grouchy, Nansouty, Friant, Gratien, are among the number.

"Kiss the children for me; and pray, my dear Laura, for my return as sincerely as I desire to be near you, whom I love with all my heart.

"I have written to the unfortunate Duchesse de Ragusa† and to the Marshal. Ask her if she has received my letter, and send me news of the Marshal, if indeed he yet survives."

In another letter, dated Mojaïsk, October 6th, 1812, Junot said:

"For the last two days the weather has been superb. I shall perhaps go to a bear hunt; if I kill one I shall send it to you in a pie."

A third letter, which I received from Junot, dated Mojaïsk, November 15th, is too important to be omitted. I transcribe it at length because it is necessary for the explanation of some things to which I shall presently refer:

"MOJAISK, November 15th, 1812.

day when you see and caress your children; I envy you during the night, when you repose among them. I hope it will not now be very long before I share this happiness with you; it is the only happiness I shall henceforth care for. I am sorry to perceive that the slightest vexation of mind has an unfavorable effect on your health. You are not yet well; but I entreat you not to torment yourself about the bulletin of the 23d. You are well aware that many innocent victims have felt the FURY OF VESUVIUS. It is a dangerous volcano, and woe to him who is out of favor and within reach of the irruption. But Jupiter may be merciful and may save those whom, but a moment before, he had abandoned to the fury of the volcano. I will tell you all some time or other. I can only tell you now that if the Emperor had seen me that day, I should have been praised; highly praised, etc."

The following is from Essling, and is dated December 22d, 1812:

"Well, my dear Laura, many days have again passed over without any letters from you, or without your receiving any from me; the fact is I have not been able to write to you. Yesterday your presents arrived at Königsberg; I thank you for them; and I hope I shall be able to go and fetch them myself. I have written to inform the Emperor of the state of my health, the urgency of my affairs, and your illness, which is augmented by my absence, and your knowledge of what I suffer. I have solicited a congé which is indispensable to me; for without it I cannot hope to recover my health, so as to be enabled to make another campaign. Request an audience of the Emperor, and urge him to grant me the congé. He surely cannot refuse it. I may yet serve him, but if I do not recover, I shall be disabled for life.

"This letter, my dear Laura, will I know, give you pain; but I must write it. I could deceive you when our condition was worse than it is; but now the truth must be told. I cannot walk without the help of a stick, and I am unable to mount my horse.* This climate is killing me, I have lived so long in warm countries, that I feel more than others the rigorous severity of this atmosphere, which, indeed, has spared no one.

"I am going to Thorn, where I hope to hear that my congé is granted. The Emperor cannot refuse it. I do not seek it merely from the desire of returning to Paris; but the state of my health, yours, and anyone to imagine the possibility of a change in his sentiments. My mind, which has been long resolved, is now more firmly made up than ever, and whatsoever may happen, my attachment to the Emperor is unalterable.

"Adieu, my beloved Laura. Kiss your children for me. Love me, and pray that you may speedily see me again.

"I shall set off immediately to Thorn. The cold is dreadfully severe.

"Yours,

"JUNOT."

I will now proceed to explain the circumstances which led Junot to the conviction that Napoleon was to him no longer the General Bonaparte of Toulon. This change was perhaps perfectly natural, but it was nevertheless revolting to Junot's ardent and impassioned soul. He required a reciprocity of friendly feeling, the more imperiously inasmuch as he knew how completely he himself remained unchanged. He was attached to the man, and not to the Emperor. He loved him as sincerely as when at Marseilles he determined to share the captivity of General Bonaparte, when the prison was but a stepping-stone to the scaffold. It may therefore be imagined what was the state of his feelings, when he beheld the first bulletin in which his name was marked by the finger of malevolence and injustice. Scarcely had he recovered from his first mortifying surprise, than a second bulletin, still more unjust than the first, overwhelmed him.

He wished to see the Emperor, and asked permission to leave Mojaïsk to go to Moscow. He hoped that a few moments' conversation would place his conduct, which had ever been noble, disinterested, and chivalrous, in its proper point of view. But Berthier still continued to send him letters like those from Wilna, which I have above quoted, and Junot was lulled into treacherous the Prince de Neufchâtel, and I subjoin to it his letter to the Emperor:

“MONSEIGNEUR:

“I have received orders from your Serene Highness to proceed hither. I have been here since yesterday evening, for there was not a village on the road, and not a drop of water to be procured. More than a third of the cavalry has been left behind and dismounted. Some went in search of villages on the roads opening into the high-road; others have proceeded to Wislieka, and it is said that some portion of the troops have taken the road to Minsk.

“Your Serene Highness's first letter directs me to proceed to Moladitchno, and there to assemble this cavalry, whence I must conclude that you think it may be assembled to-day. But some time is necessary. I will review them, count their arms and report their condition to your Serene Highness. You will see what share of glory I may hope to gain from the command which has been given me for concluding the campaign. Never was a commander of my rank sent on such a mission; and I can affirm, upon my honor, that I am not in a condition to resist fifty—I will not say Cossacks—but armed and mounted peasants. I will obey the orders I have received; but, Monseigneur, if I am doomed to end my life in a way so unworthy of my past career, I beg you will inform his Majesty of this last proof of my devotedness. Let him know that I have lived his most faithful and most attached subject, that I shall never change to the latest moment of my existence, and that I confidently consign to him the fate of my beloved and unfortunate family.

“I have the honor to be, etc.”

“To the Emperor.”

“SIRE:

“This memorable campaign is on the point of terminating. I began it with a command calculated to procure me glory, and I end it with one quite unworthy of my rank, and which can bring me nothing but dishonor. Two bulletins, Sire, have overwhelmed me with grief and astonishment. If public approbation is not the object most dear to me, the good opinion of your Majesty is that which I prize more highly than my life.

in the morning without having found him. I then recollected my opinion he had expressed on the preceding day, respecting the direction of our march; and knowing his headstrong character, I doubt but that he had determined to proceed to the right to reach the Mitislaw road. I dispatched in pursuit of him Colonel Revell, chief officer of my Staff, and he found him more than four leagues distant from us. He did not return to the camp until four in the afternoon. I heard that your Majesty had reason to be dissatisfied with General Tharreau, and I hoped by dint of marching to repair the fault he had committed. In my endeavor to screen him, I have subjected upon myself the punishment due to his misconduct.* The whole of the 8th corps can bear witness to this fact. But I am only anxious that your Majesty should know the truth: this act of self-justification is dear to me.

"The bulletin detailing the battle of the 19th of August before Borzhensko, accuses me of not having acted with SUFFICIENT firmness. Consequently I betrayed fear. Well, Sire, your Majesty may judge yourself of my conduct; it was that day witnessed by General Vassoutsky, General Sebastiani, General Bruyères, and several others. I received orders to go and defend the construction of the bridges over the Boristhenes. I did so, and we crossed that river very slowly. On account of our artillery, the bridges being in a very bad state, the roads, which we were obliged to make, also retarded us considerably. I could not debouch from the wood until two o'clock, and I took up a good position. I had received no orders to engage. I did not even know, Sire, what troops were fighting on my left; but after the lapse of an hour, and when Gudin's division arrived, the firing having commenced much more vigorously I mounted my horse and crossed the ravine with two battalions of light infantry and my cavalry. I placed them on a superb position in the enemy's rear. The plain, or rather the plateau which separated us from the position of the Russian main guard, was covered with sharpshooters and cavalry. Nevertheless, being convinced that we might be useful in the attack of the front line, I sent forward my little advance guard, who discovered that the Russians would have to reconstruct a bridge in a village on the right bank if they could pass. While this was doing, I sent to order the 8th corps to rejoin me as speedily as possible.»†

The idea of Junot wanting firmness to enter upon an engagement was pronounced to be absurd, even by his enemies, and his high favor had created him many was the King of Naples who had made that report to the Emperor. He alleged that he had addressed the following words to Junot:

“Come, Junot—march!—forward!—the Marshal’s baton is there!”

Such was the account of the affair given by the King of Naples. But Junot told a different story, and he corroborated it by proof. It was the affair with the Vesuvius, which he had explained to me in his letter from Mojaisk, dated the 15th of November. In the first place Junot, conscious of having acted rightly, expected that the cloud which had arisen between him and the Emperor would soon disperse. He knew that the Battle of Smolensko had not been attended by the result which the Emperor wished, and this disappointment sufficiently accounted to Junot for his not obtaining justice immediately. Junot waited long—perhaps too long. He at length perceived that though the Emperor must have been acquainted with everything relating to the Battle of Smolensko, yet he nevertheless observed silence. The King of Naples was to be at the head of the army on the Emperor’s return to France. Whether it was that Napoleon did not wish to offend him by a formal contradiction of his misstatement, I cannot pretend to say. But whatever might be the reason, Junot never received a word of reparation for the injuries cast upon his reputation, and a thick veil will ever conceal the first causes of the intrigue hatched against him. The army was then in full retreat. Junot received the order from the Prince of Neufchâtel, which he answered by the letter I have above quoted, and he wrote to the Emperor to explain matters, which Napoleon must have known as well as he did. The Emperor read Junot’s letter, and he read it with considerable attention:

stormy explanation than that in which, according to "Memorial" of Saint Helena, he said "he had allowed to scold him AS IF HE HAD BEEN A LITTLE BOY."

After showing us all these papers, Junot said:

"You know now all that has happened during the year. This is the truth. Must it be by the means of Napoleon that my name is to be transmitted, with false coloring, so positively! This thought kills me."

"But surely," said I to Duroc, "something must have been done in this affair. Formerly we might have spoken to the Empress Josephine. But how is it possible to get to the Emperor's ear through the medium of such a person as Maria Louisa?"

The disclosures which Junot had made to me and my friends tended greatly to relieve his mind. He now freely speak on the subject which distressed him, and Duroc, when the latter escaped from his prison, of which he was already beginning to feel the reaction.

One day Junot took him by the hand, and said:

"My dear Duroc, you have cause to complain as I. Indeed, as I said the other day, we have no reason to complain."

I had observed that since his return from Russia Junot had become much more thoughtful and serious than he had been in his life before. I knew him well enough to be assured that his thoughtfulness was not caused by anything personally concerning himself. I was not mistaken. He mentioned to us numerous circumstances calculated to create the most gloomy forebodings for the future.

The news which we received from Russia was of such a nature to banish these discouraging anticipations. Murat had abandoned the army which the Emperor had consigned to him. The more it was disorganized, more to be dreaded since its counterstroke would be felt even in Paris. A little reflection might have convinced Murat of another fact, viz, that the blow would shake Naples and his precarious throne more violently than an eruption of his VESUVIUS.

The European Tocsin—Proclamation of the Emperor Alexander—Napoleon's Speech to the Legislative Body—Alexander as Pacificator of Europe—Sixth Coalition against France—Defection of Prussia—Marshal Soult in Spain—Bernadotte's Letter to the Emperor—War Declared against Prussia—Amount of the French Army—Supplies Granted by the Senate—The Guards of Honor—Death of Lagrange—Forebodings of Junot—Duroc Endeavors to Console Him—Napoleon and the Old Soldier—Enthusiasm of France—Marshal Macdonald Abandoned—The King of Naples—Misunderstanding between Murat and Napoleon—Quarrels of the King and Queen of Naples—Murat's Demand—Napoleon's Decree—Letters from the Emperor to His Sister and Murat—Injudicious Articles in the "Moniteur"—Maria Louisa's Indifference to the Critical Nature of Affairs—King Joseph Falls Back on France—Battle of Vittoria.

WARNED of his danger by the tocsin which the Powers of Europe sounded on all sides, Napoleon once more summoned the resources of France, whose blood and treasure were never exhausted when either was required in the defense of her glory and honor. To the occupation of Warsaw by the Russians,* the Emperor answered by a senatus consultum,† which nominated the Regency during the minority of the King of Rome. To the first step which was advanced to attack him he opposed the assurance of the perpetuation propositions for it. But I will never conclude any but an honorable peace, and one that is suitable to the greatness of my Empire."

The Emperor Alexander soon undertook to play the part of pacificator of Europe. A manifesto from Warsaw, dated the 22d of February, followed the proclamation of the 10th from the same city. It called upon all the nations of Germany to declare their independence, as if it would have been less honorable to them to answer the appeal of Napoleon than to bend before the lance of a Cossack! Finally, on the 1st of March, the sixth coalition against France was proclaimed throughout Europe, and for the sixth time she proudly defied her enemies.

On the same day Prussia, following up her old system of defection, deserted her falling friend, to form an alliance with one whose fortune was rising. The treaty of alliance between Russia and Prussia was signed at Kalisch. At the same time England and Sweden also signed a treaty for overthrowing the common enemy. A man who was his natural ally—the brother-in-law of his brother, signed the treaty which was to create another enemy to France and to Napoleon; for the Prince Royal of Sweden* did all, and Charles XIII. was merely the shadow of a King.

This new treaty of 1813 was only a confirmation of preceding treaties (24th of March and 3d of May, 1812); but on this occasion Sweden was bought. The price of her treachery was twenty-five millions of francs, and the cession of Guadaloupe, which had been abandoned to the English by General Ernouf. A revolting degree of baseness characterized all these treaties and capitulations.

Every day the most disastrous news arrived from Spain. Every letter that reached us brought intelligence the latter in proportion as it gave confidence to the former; and our sojourn in Spain became more and more ever precarious. I think it must have been about the same time that Bernadotte wrote to the Emperor, recommending him, AS A FRIEND, to lay aside his ambition, and to moderate that THIRST OF CONQUEST which was fatal to him. "I am disinterested" added he, "in this question you may believe that nothing but my profound attachment to my country and to you prompts this recommendation."

Can anything be conceived more preposterous than this!—Bernadotte, Prince of Sweden, telling Napoleon, Emperor of the French, that he ought to sheath his sword when he, Bernadotte, draws his. Bernadotte, now allied to all those antiquated sovereigns whose Republican pride had so long spurned; but among them there was not one whose talent could cope with Napoleon in this respect all, except himself, were null.

While these preparations were making for the performance of the grand drama, Napoleon was actively organizing his means of defense. The Guards of France, once furnished these means, and became, as hostages for the security of the internal peace of France, which had been unceasingly insulted by the Emperor, at length took a decided step; not traitorously in the dark, but openly, in the Senate of the Empire, that assembly the declaration of war against Prussia was read.

This was a painful moment to those who, like Napoleon, and his brothers-in-arms, were acquainted with the resources of France. They knew, for example, that the French army in Germany, at the very time when it was declared against Prussia, consisted of only 30,000 troops. Its headquarters were at Statsfurts, near Erfurt. It was commanded by Prince Eugène Honor who were the occasion of so much outcry being raised against the Emperor. In this, as in many other cases, the Emperor was too well served. He asked the Minister of the Interior for only 2,000 Guards of Honor, and it was thought to be the most flattering compliment that could be paid to him to send 10,000. Thus 8,000 families vented their reproaches against the Emperor, and cursed instead of blessing him. In addition to the above supplies, 37 civic cohorts were created for the defense of the maritime fortresses.

About this time an occurrence took place which deeply affected the Emperor's spirits. It was the death of M. Lagrange, the celebrated mathematician. Napoleon was much attached to Lagrange, and was deeply affected by his death; indeed, the event made an impression on his mind which appeared almost like a presentiment.

"I cannot master my grief," said he to Duroc; "I cannot account for the melancholy effect produced upon me by the death of Lagrange. There seems to be a sort of presentiment in my affliction." Duroc endeavored to dissipate these gloomy forebodings, though he himself could not always escape their influence.

Junot had again fallen into a state of melancholy inquietude, from which all my endeavors could not rouse him. His mental dejection manifested itself in a strange way. He used frequently to shed tears. He who had always been so perfectly master of himself would now sometimes weep like a child.

I was at that time enceinte. One day, when we were alone together, he said to me in a tone and manner which I shall never forget :

"Laura, if our child should be a boy, promise, swear to me that you will bring him up to love and fear the Emperor. Promise me that you will spare no pains to my love, that my son (if it should be a son) will not receive from you the same lessons which I myself would give him?"

"But, my dear Junot, you will give him those lessons yourself."

"I! no—no. That would require me to live for years; and my life is measured only by days."

"And can you wish me to reply to such words as these? Dear Andoche, you do not consider that you are wounding the heart of one who loves you better than all the world. It is unkind to speak to me thus. However, I readily promise that the child shall be brought up as you wish; and when I make a promise, you know I will keep it. But Andoche, the state of your health requires attention. Do not think of returning to the army. To remain at home is a duty which you now owe to yourself and your family. Do not leave me; do not leave your children and your friends, whom you love, and by whom you are so fondly beloved."

Though I should live for a hundred years to come, and other recollections may vanish from my mind, I shall never forget the glance which Junot then cast upon me. His eyes flashed fire, and his whole frame was convulsed with emotion as he exclaimed:

"Laura, you do not understand me! How, when you know the injuries I have received from that plumed coxcomb*—when you know all that his vengeance has contrived to ruin me—you cannot see that I have but one answer to make to all this?

"And what is it?" inquired I tremblingly, for I was much alarmed by his excited manner.

"To die," answered he. "When I am pierced by a Russian or Austrian saber, when a Prussian or English cannon ball shall hurl me beneath my horse's feet; then dined with us that day. After dinner we withdrew to the billiard room; for Junot, who was anxious to drive off his uneasy thoughts, proposed that we should play at billiards.

"I will play against Valence," said he, "and you against M. de Flahaut. Valence," he exclaimed, "with the vivacity of a young man to snatch up the game." "Valence, I will stake twenty-five louis against a hundred bottles of your best Sillery. Will you strike the bargain?"

"Oh, with all my heart," said Valence, "especially if the Duchess will join us. But she has not time to-day." "Will."

"Oh, my wife always does as I wish. Do you wish to play, Laura?" said Junot, who appeared to be in a very good spirits.

"I can have no objection," replied I, "to be present at a duel in which the only blood that will be shed is a bottle of champagne. It would be well if it ended no worse."

As I finished speaking, Junot stepped up to me, embracing me, whispered in my ear:

"Hear me, Laura—you are a good player, and I will join you now to play your best. I have a terrible headache—a foolish one, perhaps—but no matter. I have raised his eyes, and I was struck by their rapid expression. "If I win," continued he, "I shall receive success as a token of Heaven's will respecting the end of my sufferings. There stands my comrade (I mean to General Valence). He knows me; he was before me when Murat wished to give me orders, though I was not authorized to give me any. And because I was in my duty, he ——"

"Yes, yes," said I, anxious to break off the long train of thought, "he has acted basely. But com-stake would have been but little incitement for win.

"Well," said I to M. de Flahaut, "if you please play for a bottle—mind, it must be as large as gentlemen's wine bottles—filled with eau de instead of champagne. Do you agree to this?"

"Willingly! and if you should lose, as you are valid, I will add to it a bottle of ether."

We laughed, and commenced our game. Jun won. He had his hundred bottles of Sillery, and eau de Portugal and ether.

"Well, my dear Laura, we have won," said Jun joyfully.

I looked at him with surprise, for in general very indifferent about either winning or losing.

"Do you know," said he to me, after our friend taken leave of us, "I had connected in my mind with game at billiards a thought which lies very near my heart. I played it to ascertain whether the Emperor still attached to me."

On hearing these words uttered by a man who months pined in the agony of doubting whether for whom he lived, and for whom he died, returned acknowledged his devotedness—on hearing Jun confess a weakness which he himself would have laughed at in another, I confess I was moved to tears.

"Well, then," said I, embracing him, "you see I am still attached to you. Make yourself happy, then, let me see you as cheerful as you used to be twelve months ago."

One or two mornings after this he entered my room about nine o'clock. He was pale. His eyes were red and swollen, and he appeared deeply dejected.

"Laura," said he, "I must leave you. I am almost dead. Give me what you can give me, the Emperor solicited as a favor that he would give me the being killed. This is all I now wish for."

I said everything that appeared to me could console him, and I at length succeeded in convincing him that the appointments offered to him were posts of high confidence and importance. These provinces were an object of envy to Austria for this motive, perhaps the most powerful of all that induced the Emperor of Austria to abandon the law, was not then so obvious as it afterward became. Junot became more calm and seemed convinced of the reasonableness of what I said. At that moment he was informed that Duroc wished to see him. One of his friends, foreseeing that the hardest struggle was at the first moment, had come with the kind of advice, saying what he could to calm his irritation. As he had not risen, I desired that Duroc might be brought to my chamber. Duroc was in plain clothes, and had been making a morning round with the Emperor, which he frequently did after his return from Russia.

"If he is anxious for popularity," said Frioul, "he has reason to be satisfied. Our morning walk was through the Faubourg Saint Germain. I did not myself think that he was so much loved as he is. You cannot form an idea, Junot, of the enthusiasm of the people. He stopped before the new houses that are being built in the Rue Charonne. He only slouched over his forehead as usual; but in such a way that it is so easy to recognize him that I am afraid of something unpleasant occurring in these circumstances in which I play the Giaffar. This morning he was surrounded by two hundred workmen, who were laboring with their pickaxes and shovels. The Emperor was as calm as if he had been surrounded “‘General!’ exclaimed the man in a voice faltering with emotion.

His pickaxe fell from his hand, and his limbs seemed to tremble under him.

“‘Well, well, my brave fellow!’ said the Emperor, ‘so you know me, do you? Par Dieu! and I recollect you. I said to Duroc, as soon as I saw you, “That is a face I know.” Now I recollect you perfectly—you were a corporal in the 32d, and you were wounded at the Bridge of Arcola. Par Dieu!’

“To every word uttered by the Emperor the man replied by bowing his head, and saying, ‘Yes, General.’

“‘But why have you betaken yourself to this work?’ inquired the Emperor. ‘If you can lift a spade, you can shoulder a musket.’

“‘No,’ replied the man with an oath expressive of his vexation; ‘no, I cannot carry a musket.’ And he showed us the difficulty he had in raising his arm.

“‘But you were in the Guards at Austerlitz,’ continued the Emperor. ‘Your name is Bernard, if I mistake not.’

“‘It is, General.’

“‘And why are you not in the Invalides?’

“‘I am entitled to be there, General—but——’

“‘Oh yes; I remember now what you allude to;’ and a cloud gathered on his brow. ‘Marshal Serrurier did not give me a good report of you. How happens this? If you entertain opinions unfavorable to the Government, you may leave France and go and build houses in America.’

“‘But, General, in that case, I must not only leave my country, but you—whom I love even more than my country.’

“‘Me!’ said the Emperor, laughing. ‘Par Dieu, uttered them. Even the title of GENERAL, with which he constantly addressed the Emperor, had its bright side in this little story; for it was not dictated by any feeling of insolence, but was merely the effect of habit in the old soldier. The Emperor looked at him with some little expression of dissatisfaction, but more of kindness. The old soldier stood there before him, hat in hand, and with as respectful an air as if he had been under arms on a parade day at the Tuileries.

“Ah ça!” exclaimed the Emperor, ‘have you not the cross?’

“Bernard half opened his jacket and showed the cross on his bosom. ‘You see, General, it is in its right place. You gave it me at the Battle of Wagram for a ball which the Austrians fired at me. You were passing at the moment when they were raising me up, and seeing me wounded, like a brave man, you gave me the cross. It has been a healing plaster to my wound. I never take it from my breast. I sleep with it, and when I come to work I put it within my jacket.’

“‘Why so?’ said the Emperor. ‘Do you think that your work would disgrace the cross? Your labor is honorable, and you should not blush to perform it. What would your comrades think of you?—those comrades to whom you preach republicanism? They must laugh at you, my poor Bernard; for, surely, this is nothing but pride.’

“Bernard knew not what reply to make. He recollected that some of his comrades had laughed at him, and others had been offended with him. He cast down his eyes.

“‘Have you not the pension attached to your cross?’ resumed the Emperor after a short pause. ‘I am sorry that the Marshal did not ask me what was to be done what I allude to, General. "Well," thought they have turned me out, I must try and get elsewhere;" and so I tried my hand at the pickaxe. But, still, I am sorry at being out of the valides; and if you can, General, I wish you would send me sent back again.'

"He raised his head to look at the Emperor's expressive countenance was at that moment in a persuasive, for the big tears which overflowed ran down a furrow formed by a deep scar in his cheek. The Emperor made no reply, but stood at him for some moments, then, turning to me, he gave me for my purse, and taking out three napoleons presented them to Bernard.

" 'There is something for you and your comrades to drink my health. Now go to breakfast. But do not get tipsy, for then I shall be obliged to pay your money for the loss of your day's work. Adieu.'

"The workmen all threw down their spades and cried 'Vive l'Empereur!' and thronged round Napoleon, shaking his hands. Bernard alone was silent, and he stood apart from the rest; but there was more real affection expressed in his silence than in the shouts of his comrades, which were raised for a gift of money from the Emperor, stepping up to him, said:

" 'Bernard, you must call on General Sougis and I shall shal Bessières; or, if you prefer it, come to the Emperor and ask for this young man' (striking me on the shoulder) 'He will have a message for you from me.' So he took off his hat, and bade adieu to the workmen, who continued crying, 'Vive l'Empereur!' long after he was out of sight."

I listened to this story with great interest which he related it to us. As to Duroc, it did not make soon accustomed himself to say 'his Majesty,' when he spoke of the Emperor. But the drollest part of the story is that, after the restoration of the Bourbons, he became a furious Imperialist, and would have knocked anyone down who should have dared to speak of the Emperor in his hearing without using the title "His Majesty the Emperor and King."

Bernard had been a staunch Republican before he entered the guards; but he was sincerely devoted to the Emperor. He had served at the siege of Toulon, and in the campaigns of Italy and Egypt, and he regarded General Bonaparte with a sort of religious veneration. He could imagine nothing more exalted than his title of General, immortalized as it was by so many brilliant victories; but on the establishment of the Empire, when the signatures were being collected, he went to Marshal Davoût and told him that he would not sign for the Empire. The Marshal, or some one who officiated for him, mentioned this to the Emperor. Napoleon, who wished that all the votes should be perfectly free, directed that Bernard should sign as he pleased. He accordingly gave his signature for the negative; but it was accompanied by every good wish for the welfare of his General, and the offer of his blood and his life to serve him. When he was wounded at Wagram, the Emperor, who was always anxious to preserve good soldiers and good Frenchmen, gave him the cross, and ordered that he should be attended to as carefully as if he had been one of the officers of his staff. Napoleon was pleased with the originality of his character. It is astonishing that this man never rose higher than the rank of corporal, for he was clever, and had received some little education. The Emperor forgot him for two or three years. Then came the affair of the Invalides, when Bernard had not only spoken

"Do you swear this?"

"Upon my honor."

"Enough, Duroc. Then I am convinced he has changed. I will therefore set off. I will go wherever he may desire me to go; and, after that, matters whether my blood be shed in the North or South? But I should wish that the Emperor would receive me, as he did when I was in Portugal, the prince corresponding with him directly. Do you think I will?"

"I am sure of it."

"How can you be sure of it?"

"Because he told me so."

"Duroc," said Junot joyfully, "ask him to give me an audience to-morrow morning."

On the following morning Junot saw the Emperor. Napoleon was as kind to him as he could possibly be. He set off for Illyria, where it was arranged that he would join him as soon as the state of my health would permit me to undertake the journey. Junot was to go to Trent, and then to prepare my residence at Vienna.

France has been reproached with having abandoned the cause of Napoleon in 1814. Perhaps there really was at that time a depression of spirit, which had its effect on the conduct of the French people. But I can confidently affirm that in the preceding year (1813) the enthusiasm was very great. The country was not in danger. Napoleon openly proclaimed this, and the people heard him. The disasters of the retreat from Moscow were frightful; but such was the affection for the Emperor that man inspired that the mass of the people breathed not a syllable of reproach. Some few voices might be heard, and occasionally foolish or even clever things might be said; but what of that? France faithfully pursued FOREIGN INVASION were pronounced. These words were electrical.

Prussia, who was the first, as she ever has been, to give the signal of defection, then perpetrated the odious affair of Taurogen. General York abandoned Marshal Macdonald, who had penetrated victoriously into Samogitia, attacked Livonia, and threatened Riga. He was then constrained to abandon his success, and not only to fall back, but to see his unworthy ally sign a convention with the Russians. Macdonald was obliged to retire as far as Lawartz and the Oder, instead of establishing himself in the enemy's territory. But this treachery excited only a louder cry to arms. France became a camp, and every town an arsenal.

I have already mentioned that the King of Naples departed for his kingdom, consigning to Prince Eugène the command of the army which Napoleon had intrusted to him (Murat). The Emperor had placed a sacred trust in his hands, but he could not appreciate it. He abandoned the precious remains of our brave legions, and cast upon the Viceroy of Italy the whole weight of that responsibility which Napoleon had given as a mark of preference to one whom he thought the bravest and most worthy. He ran away from the responsibility, in short; for the truth must be told. He forsook the army at Posen and returned to Naples.

I will here relate a few particulars which throw some light on the obscurity of this part of his life. A rancorous feeling had superseded the sentiments which once united the two brothers-in-law; these sentiments, however, had never been of the most cordial description. Napoleon's partiality for Murat was grounded solely on his courage, and the useful account to which it might be turned. I do not say this from my own personal im-

DUCHESS OF ABRANTÈS

The circumstance which rendered King Joachim inimical to his brother-in-law had its rise in war place at the time of his expedition against Sicily. Murat saw himself braved by the Anglo-Sicilians, and with an impulse of courage which was peculiar to him, he exclaimed "En avant!" without even considering that he would be followed. He proposed a descent on Sicily. The course was arranged, and one division of General Cavaignac, started on the campaign; the other division did not follow — why, I cannot precisely say.

But the King of Naples explained the matter which reflected great blame on his brother-in-law. He attributed its nonsuccess to the Emperor, who, he said, had given secret orders. He returned to Naples humiliated by his defeat, and with revenge rankling in his mind. From that time ill feeling was apparent between Joachim and Napoleon, and a bitter correspondence was maintained on between the Court of the Tuileries and that of Naples.

Queen Caroline, who had been carrying on a constant opposition to her husband, through circumstances of a purely domestic nature, seeing a fair pretext for her conduct, took part against the King; and the Palace of the Tuileries presented the scandalous spectacle of a conjugal dissension. These dissensions extended to the individuals of the Court. Every trifle afforded the King and Queen a pretext for annoying each other.

There was a physician or surgeon named Paborde who was a great favorite of the King, and was consequently detested by the Queen; Paborde was on the eve of marriage with a very beautiful young lady (Mademoiselle Mème). This affair, which nobody would have dreamed of if the King and Queen had not meddled and the interior of the Palace of Naples was a scene of discord.

A second demand, equally maladroit and ill timed, completed the misunderstanding between the two Crowned Heads. Murat required that all the French in his service should be naturalized as Neapolitans. The thing was ill judged in every way. "Ah!" said the Emperor, "then it would appear that our brother no longer regards himself as a Frenchman." In his indignation at this proposition of Murat, Napoleon immediately issued the following decree, which Joachim did not easily forget:

"Considering that the Kingdom of Naples forms a PORTION OF THE GRAND EMPIRE; that the Prince who reigns in that country has RISEN FROM THE RANKS OF THE FRENCH ARMY; that he was raised to the Throne BY THE EFFORTS AND THE BLOOD OF FRENCHMEN, Napoleon declares that French citizens are BY RIGHT citizens of the Two Sicilies."

I had at that time a great number of friends in Naples, several of whom held appointments at the Court. All concurred in assuring me that nothing could be more absurd than the conduct of Murat on this occasion. He sulked like a child, tore off his Cross of the Legion of Honor, and the Grand Cordons of the Order. He repaired to Capo-di-Monte, and there the most disagreeable altercations ensued between him and the Queen. Murat devoted himself to low private intrigues, and frequently passed a great part of the night in reading police reports, which were the more calculated to alarm him, inasmuch as those who drew them up knew his weak side. To gratify his taste for espionage he lost sight of what was due to himself; for he would receive and converse with the lowest and most degraded field of battle; and in the campaign of Russia he showed the greatest valor and determination. He gained battles over the Russians, and added to the glory of our eagles. In the dreadful retreat from Moscow the Emperor was surrounded by a battalion which might justly have been called his IMPERIAL BATTALION. In it colonels discharged the duty of sub-officers, and generals that of captains and lieutenants. Murat was Colonel of this battalion.

There was something chivalrous in this body of men, decorated with gold epaulets, thus constituting themselves the Guard of their beloved chief; for such Napoleon was to them at that time, though he thought proper to tell me, in the audience I had with him after his return from Russia, that he experienced nothing but ingratitude.

It has been alleged that when Murat received the command from the Emperor he consented only to lead the army into the Prussian territory, and that as soon as it should reach Königsberg he was to return to Naples. Those who knew anything of the Emperor must be convinced of the inaccuracy of this statement. Is it to be supposed that at a moment when he had serious reason to be displeased with Murat he would have allowed the latter to dictate terms to him—he who would never submit to dictation from any of the Powers of Europe?

The idea is absurd; besides an article in the "Moniteur" of the 8th of February (that is, after he learned that Murat had abandoned the command) proves quite the contrary. The following is the article alluded to:

"The King of Naples being indisposed, has been obliged to resign the command of the army, which he has transferred to the Prince Viceroy. The latter is more accustomed to the management of important trusts, and he has the entire confidence of the Emperor."

with your conduct since I left the army; for that is owing to the weakness of your character. You are a good soldier. You fight bravely on the field of battle; but out of it you have neither character nor energy. However, I presume you are not of the number of those who believe that the lion is dead, and that they may, etc. If you make this calculation you are completely deceived. You have done me all the harm that you possibly could do since my departure from Wilna. But I will say no more of that. The title of King has turned your head. If you wish to preserve that title you must look to your conduct."

This letter, which was addressed to Murat in 1813, gave the finishing stroke to his wounded vanity, which had been not a little mortified by the article in the "Moniteur." He now became the enemy of Napoleon.

I may here observe that it was singularly injudicious in Napoleon to sanction the insertion of offensive personalities in the "Moniteur." He perhaps created more enemies by that unfortunate journal than by his cannon. The article on the Queen of Prussia, for example, which was at once false and unjust; those on the Prince Royal of Sweden, M. de Stadion, M. de Metternich, etc., together with all that appeared from 1803 to 1814 against the Prince of Wales, afterward George IV. Truly it is inconceivable that so great a man as Napoleon should have resorted to such petty means of punishing those who had incurred his displeasure.

Meanwhile the clouds gathered more and more thickly, and the storm seemed ready to break. At this critical moment how was Maria Louisa employed—she who, of all others, might be supposed to tremble when the Austrian cannon were about to roar on the heights of Montmartre? The Empress occupied herself in working embroidery and playing on the piano. She visited her

At this it was especially requisite that our force in Spain have been headed by such men as Marshal Soult and Marshal Suchet. But what signified this victory? Jourdan, who commanded King Joseph's army, was unluckily at the head of it at the fatal Battle of Vittoria. All was lost, baggage, artillery, everything fell into the hands of the enemy. The road to France was impracticable, and necessary to proceed by way of Pampeluna, and in that direction the road was covered with guerrillas, so that General Foy, with twenty thousand men, stopped almost the whole right wing of the English at the Battle of Tolosa in Biscay.

On hearing of the disastrous Battle of Vittoria, the Emperor sent for Marshal Soult. "You must conquer Spain," said he, "in an hour. All has been lost by the strangest mismanagement. Depart, and serve me in your country, as I know you can serve her, and your attitude will be boundless!" Marshal Soult departed. Dresden possessed of no other information than the destruction of the Army of Spain. He arrived at the frontier just as the expiring wrecks of that sun-

THE Sixth Continental Coalition, as I have said, was now formed against France. The Emperor had, perhaps, provoked the total defection of Prussia by his ill-judged rejection of the propositions addressed, on the 6th of February, by M. Hardenberg to Comte de Saint Marsan, our Minister at Berlin. These propositions had for their object to make the King of Prussia a pacificator between the two Emperors. The Court of Berlin, and especially the King, were perfectly sincere when, in February, 1813, they offered their mediation. Two circumstances of little importance prevented its being accepted, and induced Napoleon to place but little faith in this friendly proposition, the protecting air of which was certainly ill calculated to please him.

It is well known that after the Battle of Jena the Emperor Napoleon received overtures from the famous association called the Tugend Bund (the Union of Virtue) of Germany. The Tugend-Bund had greatly increased its power since the Battle of Jena. The cabinet of Berlin was under the influence of that association, and its organ in important circumstances; it had been influential in determining King William to depart from where other interests were to come under consideration. The Tugend-Bund thus became the enemy of Napoleon through his refusal to espouse its cause.

On learning that the King of Prussia was a friend of Napoleon smiled, with an expression which enabled those who observed him to guess what was passing in his mind. The note communicated to M. de Saurin was refused, with some offensive remark. The Emperor, on two causes which at that time urged the Emperor to a sort of half-revealed hostility toward Prussia, and the uncertainty he supposed he possessed of the treasures of the Cabinet of Berlin, and, on the other hand, the confidence he reposed in the Cabinet of Vienna.

As soon as Prussia declared war against France, France proclaimed her accession to the treaty of Cisleithania alliance, we were in a terrible position. The army commanded by Prince Eugène, which constituted our principal force, did not amount to two thousand men and a few troops! The Viceroy performed prodigies of valor, but time he remained without aid and almost without resources, surrounded only by dissatisfied troops, and by a large number to desert our cause. We were still in possession of Magdeburg, and the Viceroy's headquarters were at Halberstadt, while Rapp, who was stationed at Dantzic, maintained himself like a hero. Napoleon departed for the Illyrian Provinces and Venice, and the English threatened the coast of the South, and the Emperor saw, in the hour of danger, the advantage of sending thither a man devoted to him like his old friend. Berlin was occupied by the General. The ceased to smile, and alarm had now taken the place of confidence. News was looked for with a mingled feeling of impatience and fear. It was known that negotiations were opened—but what would be the result?

The Imperial Family assembled at Dresden. The Emperor of Austria, the best of men, and most affectionate of fathers was happy to see his daughter again, and, above all, to see her happy, for so she certainly was. At that time the Emperor Francis was not inclined to go to war. Austria was no doubt eager to repair her losses, and especially to make amends for the vast misfortunes which had surrounded her since 1805. Thus, in 1808, the Cabinet of Vienna proposed to that of St. Petersburg the triple alliance of Austria, Prussia, and Russia, which proposition was rejected. But, in 1813, if Napoleon had consented to restore the Illyrian Provinces, and some other conquests useless to France but important to Austria, the latter power would have been what natural and political laws had ordained she should be—our faithful ally.

Napoleon, having left Paris on the 15th of April, arrived at Mayence on the 17th, and on the 25th reached Erfurth. Here he remained a few days and then proceeded to his headquarters. The Battle of Weissenfels was fought on the 29th of April. Our advanced guard, composed entirely of infantry, for we had no cavalry since the disasters of Moscow, defeated the Russian advanced guard, which was composed entirely of cavalry. Alas! this partial triumph was the precursor of a sad reverse of fortune. The ground was disputed foot by foot.

Napoleon was well aware that the issue of the campaign depended on its opening. The conflict was obstinate on both sides and every little skirmish was attended with vast bloodshed. General Wittgenstein commanded a important it was for the French army to gain possession of them, entered the defile of Rippach, which was more strongly defended than the rest, and advanced sword in hand at the head of the tirailleurs, whom he encouraged at once by his words and his example. The heights were carried, the enemy was routed, and we were in possession of the defile. At this moment Bessières, who was always the first in the face of danger, received a fatal wound. A ball entered his breast, and he breathed his last before he could be fully aware of the glory that attended his death.

His aids-de-camp and those immediately about him for a time concealed the event from the knowledge of the army. A cloak was thrown over the body, and the Emperor was the only person made acquainted with the misfortune. The intelligence overwhelmed him. Bessières's death was an immense loss to Napoleon; he felt it both as a Sovereign and a friend. That same night the Emperor wrote these few lines to the Duchess of Istria: "Your husband has perished for his country—and he closed without pain his glorious life."

After this first disastrous loss, a triumph, though won with blood-stained laurels, was ostentatiously announced by the French journals. This was the Battle of Lutzen. Napoleon probably wished to revive the recollection of Gustavus Adolphus, who died and was interred at Lutzen. The Emperor arrived at the latter place on the night of the 1st of May. His spirits were greatly depressed.* The death of Bessières, which had happened only a few hours before, and which he was constrained at the moment to conceal—the critical circumstances in which he was placed—all tended to cast a gloom over every surrounding object. Napoleon was not usually influenced by external circumstances, but the very weight of his

He visited the tomb of Gustavus Adolphus,* and there, in the silence of night, during the interval between the loss of a beloved friend and the gaining of a victory, Napoleon experienced impressions which, by his own acknowledgment, appeared to him a revelation. Be this as it may, the Battle of Lutzen was won by a phenomenon, or an inspiration of the Emperor's genius, which a mind like his might naturally attribute to a sort of predestination.

"This is like one of our Egyptian battles," said he, as he surveyed the ground; "we have infantry and artillery, but no cavalry; gentlemen, we must not spare ourselves here!" He afterward remarked: "I have gained the Battle of Lutzen like the General-in-Chief of the Army of Italy and the Army of Egypt!" In the utmost heat of the action Napoleon alighted from his horse, and, to use his own words, he DID NOT SPARE HIMSELF. Whole batteries were carried by bayonet charges.

Meanwhile Prince Eugène, by a skillful and well-executed march, had opened the gates of Dresden to the aged King of Saxony. This was the last exploit of the Viceroy's brilliant campaign. Unfortunately Napoleon required his services in Italy, whither he returned on the 12th of May, the very day on which the King of Saxony re-entered his capital. On the 18th of May, Eugène was in Milan. By his intelligence and activity he raised a new army, and that army was fighting in Germany in the month of August following. It consisted of 45,000 infantry and 2,000 cavalry. All this partakes of the miraculous. Within the space of eleven months the Army of Italy furnished nearly 90,000 troops—40,000 at the beginning of 1812, 20,000 in the autumn, and 28,000 at the end of March, 1813.

These latter, commanded by General Bertrand, joined Prince. The conversation was warmly maintained; there appeared reason to apprehend that something pleasant might ensue. The Emperor began to give self-command. He advanced toward M. de Metternich speaking in an elevated tone of voice, and by a motion of his arm he struck the hat which M. Metternich held in his hand, and it fell to the ground. Napoleon saw this, and appeared a little disconcerted by the accident.

The interlocutors continued walking about; M. Metternich maintained his sang-froid, and took no notice of the hat. This circumstance, so trivial in itself, had a great influence on the mind of Napoleon; he became embarrassed, and looked at the unfortunate hat every time he passed it in a way that showed he was not a little at his own warmth. "What will he do?" thought Metternich, who was resolved to go away without it rather than stoop to take it up.

After two or three turns up and down the room the Emperor, by an artful manœuvre, managed to pass close to the hat, so that it came precisely in his way. He then gently gave it a kick with his foot, picked it up, and carefully laid it on a chair which stood near the door. In this little affair, so insignificant in itself, Napoleon showed all the address and presence of mind which he so well knew how to exercise in matters of great importance.

While the Army of Italy was engaged in opposition to the Russians, the most active communications were maintained between France and Austria. Comte de Narbonne and M. de Caulaincourt, both of whom were very anxious to bring about peace, to which they were likewise convinced Russia was not averse, were appointed to negotiate on the part of France. The Battle of

It rendered us masters of all the roads leading to Silesia, and thus opened to us the heart of Prussia.

The news, circulated about this time, of the junction of the Prince Royal of Sweden with the coalition of the Allies, added to the public disquiet. On the 18th of May he had landed at Stralsund with 30,000 Swedes. This, on the part of Bernadotte, was an absolute treason to his country, which nothing can ever obliterate. At Stralsund he assembled, under his own command, an army of 140,000 men, consisting of Russians, Prussians, and Swedes. This was the army which, after having beaten Marshal Ney at Dennewitz, as well as the brave Oudinot, saved Berlin, by preventing Napoleon from profiting by the advantage gained at Dresden.

Paris was deserted. Those ladies whose husbands were absent with the army had set off to their country seats, or to the different watering places, and none remained in the capital except those who, like myself, had peremptory reasons for not leaving it. A little circle of friends assembled at my house every evening. Lavalette came to see me on one of these occasions, and I observed that he looked gloomy and chagrined, he who was always so cheerful and good-humored.

"Heavens!" exclaimed I; "what is the matter? You look as melancholy as if you had come from a funeral!" Lavalette changed color. He put his hand into his bosom and drew out a letter. It was from the Grand Army, and was in the handwriting of Duroc. "Ah!" said I; "a thousand thanks for this. I have not had news for so long a time!"

I broke open the letter; it had been written at two separate times, and so rapidly that it was scarcely legible. He had begun to write to me on the eve of the Battle of Bautzen, and had finished the letter next day—so at is content with him, and 'qu'il l'aime toujours.' Poor Junot ! it is with him as with me ; the friendship of the Emperor is the breath of our life ; indeed, I could not support the sight of his displeasure.

"The death of Bessières is terrible. He is fortunate in the tribute of universal regret that has been paid to him.

"Yet another victory ! It seems that a happy presentiment made me hasten to close my letter. This victory is the result of one of the finest pieces of generalship in the whole military career of the Emperor. You can indeed be proud of his talents. Good-bye. Send me word how you are. I am anxious about you.

"DUROC."

Next morning, before ten o'clock, M. de Lavalette again called on me. On recollecting his agitated manner the night before, a sinister idea crossed my mind ; I thought of Illyria, and hurrying to meet him as soon as he entered, I exclaimed : "What has happened to Junot ?" "Nothing," he replied ; and, seating himself beside me, he took both my hands in his, and said in that feeling manner so peculiarly his own :

"My dearest friend, we have sustained a great misfortune, for it is a misfortune common to us all." Then, after a pause, as if fearful to utter the fatal words, he added : "Duroc is dead ! He was killed at the Battle of Ripenbach, or, rather, by one of those fatalities which Providence is pleased to inflict upon us—it was after the battle was ended !"

He then informed me that Duroc, standing behind the Emperor in conversation with General Kirschner, was killed by the ricochet of a ball, which was fired from so great a distance that it was inconceivable how it should have taken effect. It did so, however, and too fatally ; for the second rebound inflicted Duroc's deathblow. This event deeply affected the Emperor. He followed the Duke of Friouli to a cottage, to which he was conveyed, in the village of Marksdorff, at the entrance of him never excited envy. His death was an irreparable loss to Napoleon.*

I had many friends at Naples attached to the Court of the Queen and King Joachim, and I received from them, about this time, letters which surprised me strangely. The King, I was informed, had received from the Emperor orders to rejoin him in Germany, and it was reported, even in the interior of the Palace, that Joachim refused to go. I may here briefly relate the circumstances which followed the inexplicable departure of the King of Naples, when he abandoned the French at Posen on the 17th of January, 1813.

Murat, doubtless, behaved badly to the Emperor; but it is a fact of which I have proofs in my possession, that a conspiracy formed in the bosom of his family was the sole cause of his first faults. It was likewise a very artfully-contrived scheme which occasioned his precipitate departure from Posen on the 17th of January. Unfounded alarms were raised in the mind of Joachim relative to the designs of the English on his dominions. Urgent messages were dispatched to him, with the intelligence that an English fleet was in sight off the coast of Calabria, and that preparations were making for a landing.

This intelligence, together with letters from the Queen, induced him suddenly to leave his headquarters at Posen. He set off, accompanied by his aid-de-camp, General Rosetti, and hurried to Naples in a state of anxiety which almost deprived him of the power of sleeping or taking food. Sometimes he would rub his head, and wildly exclaim: "The English! The English! Rosetti, you will see that when we get to Florence we shall find they have landed, and that they are masters of Calabria!"

Instead of repairing to Naples, he proceeded to Caserta, where the Queen and her family then were. The Napoleon gave him the command of the right wing of the army on the day of the Battle of Dresden.

From that time to the moment of his departure for Italy, which was after the Battle of Leipsic, his conduct was worthy of what he had shown himself to be when with the Army of Italy and in Egypt. He seemed anxious to prove that he had no wish to spare his blood in the service of the Emperor.

Our ill fortune in Spain produced a fatal influence in the North in spite of the presence of Napoleon. The combined disasters of Russia and the Peninsula inspired our adversaries with renewed confidence. Alliances were signed against us in all quarters. The treaties of Reichenbach and Peterswalden gave to the coalition an army of two hundred and fifty thousand men; and yet, at the commencement of the campaign, England was so destitute of financial resources that she could not grant subsidies.

About this time I received a letter from Junot dated Gorizia. He had set out on a long journey along the shore of the Adriatic; but the information he received led him to apprehend that the English would effect a landing at Fiume. He immediately returned to Gorizia; and on the 5th of July the English really presented themselves before Fiume with a small squadron, consisting of an eighty-gun ship and several smaller vessels filled with English troops. The ships fired on the city, and after a short resistance, which was materially abridged by the defection of some Croatian troops, the English effected a landing.

General Moreau, who had resided for some time in America, embarked on the 21st of June for Europe, accompanied by his wife and M. de Swinine, a person attached to the Russian embassy. Moreau returned to remorse when he beheld those national colors and those uniforms which he himself had so often led against the Austrians and Prussians. On the eve of the Battle of Dresden the Emperor Alexander came to him and said: "I have come to receive your commands; I am your aid-de-camp." A Russian officer who was present on this occasion assured me that when the Emperor Alexander uttered the above words Moreau became deadly pale, and trembled so violently that it was easy to discern the painful state of his feelings. One day he met General Jomini, who, owing to some cause of dissatisfaction, had left the French army, in which he had long served. Moreau, though but slightly acquainted with him, was so happy to find someone situated like himself that he stepped up to him and took him cordially by the hand. General Jomini, however, withdrew his hand, and replied coolly to the greeting of Moreau.

"It is somewhat strange," said the latter to his fellow-renegade, but with a certain degree of reserve, for he saw the other was not inclined to meet his advances—"it is strange that we should meet here under circumstances so similar." "It is one of the whimsical decrees of fate," replied General Jomini; "but, after all, our cases are not so very similar, for you must know I am not a Frenchman." Moreau heaved a deep sigh, and, covering his face with his hand, turned away and said no more. This circumstance took place three or four days before his death.*

*Moreau was killed in the following manner:—Accompanied by the Emperor Alexander, he was making a reconnaissance before Dresden on the 27th of August, 1813. The Czar, following up his declaration of being Moreau's aid-de-camp, obliged him to pass first along a bridge which was rather narrow. A ball fired from the French army struck Moreau and shattered his right knee, then,

THE severe shock I had sustained by the death of my two valued friends, Bessières and Duroc, had produced a serious effect upon my health; but, alas! a still more dreadful blow awaited me. One day, as I was reclining on my sofa after a sleepless night and much suffering, I was startled by the voice of my brother, who was speaking loudly in the adjoining room. In his interlocutor I fancied I recognized the voice of the Duke of Rovigo. In a moment the door was opened, and the Duke, though kept back by my brother, pushed his way into the room.

"I come by command of the Emperor," cried the Duke, "and in his name I must have free access everywhere."

useless." The surgeon replied that he feared it would be impossi-

At these words Albert ceased to dispute his entrance, and he advanced into the room. Albert stepped up to me, and taking both my hands in his, said in a voice faltering with agitation: "My beloved sister—summon all your resolution, I implore you. The Duke brings you sad tidings—Junot has been attacked with a serious illness." *

These words pierced me to the heart; I uttered a stifled scream, but could not articulate a single word. Albert, perceiving the thought that crossed my mind, embraced me, and said: "No, on my honor, nothing has happened worse than what I tell you. My dear sister, compose yourself; for the sake of your children, for the sake of Junot, I entreat you."

He threw on my knee a letter which he had brought with him, and which inclosed another one from my husband. It was one which Junot had written in the first that he was assailed by an intolerable thirst, and that he suffered the torture of a death in the desert. He expired on the night of the 1st of September. His body was embalmed at Prague, and conveyed to St. Petersburg, where the Czar caused it to be buried in the Catholic church of that city.

On the 28th of August the curiosity of the wayfarers in one of the streets of Dresden was attracted by the piteous howling of a dog. He was one of those English terriers so remarkable for attachment to their masters. The dog wandered about evidently seeking someone he loved; at length, when exhausted by fatigue, he lay down at the threshold of a door. One of the passers-by, who had been struck by the poor animal's evident distress, observed a silver collar which he wore round his neck, and on examining it closer found inscribed upon it the words, "J'appartiens au Général Moreau."

* Immediately on receiving the intelligence mentioned above, I, though in a delicate condition of health, set out for the frontier, and proceeded as far as Chamouni, where I awaited with impatience the arrival of Junot. The General, however, had been brought to Lyons, and thence was conveyed to my father-in-law's residence at Montbard.

When the news of Junot's death reached the Emperor, he was at the Marcolini Palace at Dresden. He had there an apartment where he transacted business, a very favorite one of his, as it opened immediately upon the garden, and also had a private exit, so that he was not obliged to run the gauntlet of the Chamberlains and Court officials.

When my brother's letter was given to him he hastily tore it open, holding it in his left hand. After he had read the first few lines he violently hit the letter with his right hand, striking it out of his grasp, and then, recovering his hold with the rapidity of a flash of lightning, exclaimed: "Junot! . . . Junot! . . . Great God! . . ." clasping his hands together so tightly that the letter was completely crushed.

moments of his madness, and he had sent it off by a special courier to the Emperor, who now forwarded it to me, accompanied by a few words in his own handwriting:

"MADAME JUNOT:— Look at the inclosed letter which your husband has written to me. I have been greatly distressed in reading it. It will give you a terrible insight as to his condition, and you should take immediate measures to remedy it. Leave without losing an instant. Junot must now be on the French frontier, according to the news given to me by the Viceroy. "N."

I let the letter of the Emperor fall to the ground, and gazed half stupefied at my brother and at the Duke of Rovigo. Indeed, I was myself almost bereft of reason at that moment.

The suddenness of the intelligence completely overpowered me. I had received, only four days previously, a long letter from Junot, which bore not the slightest trace of the terrible mental illness that was now so unexpectedly disclosed to me. The Emperor would not allow Junot to be brought to Paris for medical aid, but directed that he should be taken to his family at Montbard. Alas! my most dreadful anticipations were realized. The most unfortunate scene had ensued on the arrival of my husband in his paternal home.

Junot's father, who was naturally of a melancholy temperament, sank into a state of helpless stupor on witnessing the afflicting malady of his son. Junot's sisters could do nothing but weep and lament, and his nephew, Charles Maldan, was a perfect nullity. Junot was, however, surrounded by the affection of the inhabitants of his native town, who seemed to vie with each other in showing him the most considerate attention.

There are events which the mind cannot endure to dwell on, in spite of any effort to summon resolution. I can scarcely ever bring myself to think or speak of the melancholy scenes which ensued at Montbard after the arrival of Junot, who breathed his last on the 29th of July, at four in the afternoon.

* * * * *

Now, after the lapse of a long interval of time, I can pardon, though I cannot forget, the culpable stupidity of Junot's family, who suffered the man whose safety they should have watched over from pride, if not from affection, to do what he did in the delirium of a brain fever.

My own convalescence was long retarded. Though still at the early age of twenty-seven, I had been struck down by two of the most cruel blows a woman could undergo—the simultaneous loss of a husband and a child.

Indeed, for a long time my brother Albert could not look at me without the tears standing in his eyes, as he regarded my excessive paleness as being the precursor of my death.

One morning a post chaise entered the court of Secheron, and, to my surprise, my brother-in-law, M. Geouffre, got out of it. "My children, my children! What has happened to them?" I cried. "Nothing at all," he said. "I have come to bring you a letter from the Minister of State, in which he has officially demanded all the private correspondence of the Emperor with Junot." Junot possessed more than 500 letters in Napoleon's own handwriting, and these were kept in a secret drawer. Albert sprang up from his chair, and exclaimed in a voice of thunder: "It is false! The Emperor cannot have commanded such an insult!" The Duke of Rovigo had presented himself at my Hôtel, and had requested the presence of one of the guardians of my husband's property in order that he might obtain possession of the Emperor's letters. My brother-in-law attended, and informed him that the usual official seals after death had been placed on all the drawers in the absence of the owner. General Savary only laughed at this reply, and said: "Bah! I have my orders. You must give me the letters of the Emperor, and I must take them." My brother told him of an obstacle in the way—namely, a golden word-lock placed upon the secret coffer. "The Duchess is the only person who knows the word now my poor brother no longer exists; and the key which the Duke always carried about with him was lost during his illness." "I beg your pardon," said the Duke of Rovigo, holding out his hand, "here is your brother's gold key."

This was a circumstance I could never understand. Albert had seen the key recently at Montbard. How, then, could Savary have got possession of it?

The coffer was opened, for the Duke had also discovered the password (which was my own name misspelled—"LORE"), and he took out all the letters of the Emperor, and also those of another member of his family, my brother-in-law protesting at the same time against the violation of the seals which had been placed upon my property by the Juge de la Paix.

The intelligence from Spain received in private letters was very alarming. Napoleon still maintained the war in the Peninsula, and contented himself with sending back Marshal Soult, whose forces he diminished by taking 12,000 of the Guard, and nearly 40,000 of the old troops. This was depopulating the Army of Spain. The result of this measure was that Marshal Suchet was obliged to abandon Valencia, and march on the Ebro. In the meantime we signed a Treaty of Alliance with Denmark, and the Congress of Prague was opened.

At that Congress were decided the destinies of Europe, and Napoleon lost the game he was playing against the Sovereigns solely by his own fault. One of the causes which chiefly contributed to his error was the mistaken opinion he had formed of M. Metternich. I have heard him express this opinion in conversation. Subsequently, perhaps, he corrected it; but at that time M. Metternich's dignity was wounded.

On the 8th of August, Napoleon sent new propositions to the Emperor Francis. New discussions ensued. The 10th of August arrived; the armistice was broken, and the Sovereigns of Sweden, Russia, and Prussia signified to France their intention of resuming hostilities. There then appeared reason to believe that Napoleon's principal object had been merely to gain the time necessary for the arrival of his troops.

As to the Confederation of the Rhine, it was first proposed to break it up—then continue it. The whole of Italy was to remain under the direct or indirect domination of France. We therefore became a dangerous rival to England with our ports, and those of Italy, Belgium, and Holland. The war commenced. Napoleon had now to depend upon the resources of his genius. The Allied forces amounted to 600,000 men, while those of France did not exceed 350,000, two-thirds of which consisted of young conscripts scarcely arrived at manhood. To the numerical advantage of the Allies must be added the immense advantage they possessed in fighting on friendly territories, with the facility of obtaining provisions, etc.

On the 20th of August, Napoleon was informed of the junction of the Austrian troops with the Allies. Prince Schwartzenberg was appointed Generalissimo of all the forces of the Coalition. Napoleon was still himself, and his presence at the head of his army had not lost its magic power. On the 20th of August he learned that Austria had abandoned him; and on the 21st he resumed the offensive, and defeated Blucher. Amid the triumph of Goldberg,* he was warned of the march of the Allies on Dresden,† advised by Moreau. He resigned the Army of Silesia to Macdonald, and hastened with his Guard to succor Dresden,‡ where he arrived at nine on the morning of the 26th.

Some skirmishing was going on in the suburbs. Napoleon then gave an example of that luminous intelligence which elevated him to the highest rank among military commanders. His eagle eye scanned the battle at a glance. He immediately saw the course on which depended victory or defeat. Instead of waiting for the attack, he ordered it. The Prussians and Russians, apparently bewildered by the impetuosity of the movement, were repulsed to a great distance, leaving 40,000 slain on the ground which they had been masters of in the morning.

On the evening of that day Napoleon entered Dresden with the 2d and 6th corps. Throughout the whole of the battle he had himself fought like a sub-lieutenant, sword in hand; he was always the foremost, leading the way with equal indifference to death or glory. During the battle he had only 65,000 men to contend with 185,000. Next day the Emperor arose before daylight, having had only two hours' sleep. He took his station in the center, with the King of Naples on his right and the Prince of the Moskowa on his left. In this manner he attacked the enemy, whose forces amounted to 180,000.

Napoleon's plan was not, and could not have been, arranged beforehand. He took his glass, and examined the field of battle. He discerned a great void. This was to be filled up by the corps of Kleinau, but it could not be brought up until two o'clock, and it was now only six. Napoleon at once conceived his plan of victory. The attack was arranged, executed, and proved victorious. The enemy lost 17,000 prisoners, and 14,000 killed or wounded. Such were the results of this brilliant and ably-planned battle.*

He was now master of Dresden. Alexander was flying, and Fortune had resumed her smiles. But, in the meanwhile, Marshal Macdonald had sustained a terrible reverse. Blucher was driving him from Silesia. Marshal Davoût also was evacuating Schwerin. General Vandamme was made prisoner in the mountains of Bohemia with 12,000 men. Marshal Oudinot was defeated by his old comrade Bernadotte.

This event saved Berlin, which the Emperor had so confidently counted on entering that decrees had been prepared dated from that city. The disasters of the campaign were in a great measure attributed, and perhaps justly, to General Jomini, who carried over to the enemy documents which he had surreptitiously obtained from Marshal Ney. The intelligence thus conveyed saved Berlin, as it made known Napoleon's intention of proceeding thither.

Not only in the North, and under his own eyes, did reverses crowd upon each other; Spain was torn from him, province by province, village by village. Our troops bravely defended every inch of ground; but resistance only served to prove our weakness. Marshal Suchet, however, once more sounded the trumpet of victory. Lord William Bentinck, who had brought fresh troops from Sicily, landed them on the coast of Catalonia.

A battle was fought at Villafranca de Panada, eight leagues from Barcelona, and the Anglo-Sicilian army, which was defeated by Generals Suchet and Decaen, lost an immense number of troops. But such was our position that we could not afford to lose a single man, even though his loss might be compensated by slaying ten of the enemy. The victory of Villafranca de Panada did not prevent the surrender of Saint Sebastian. The English took that fortress after a protracted and inglorious siege; and they committed all the horrors which we read of in the history of the Middle Ages on the occasion of the sacking of cities by the bands of condottieri or free troops. Wellington now crossed the Bidassoa and entered France.

Hostilities had recommenced on the 28th of September by a combined movement of three of the Allied armies. The Emperor at first beat Blucher, and obliged him to retire on the Saale. Napoleon seemed now to flatter himself with the idea of renewing on the line of the Elbe, the glory of Frederick in his wars with Austria. It is strange that in such a position he should have allowed empty visions to engross his mind. His most important object was to secure the fidelity of Bavaria and Wirtemberg; and these two Allies forsook him.

He learned at Duben the defection of both from the King of Wirtemberg himself. The Emperor entered Leipsic on the 15th of October. We now possessed only 600 pieces of artillery, and the Allies had more than 1,000. All the veteran and most efficient portion of our army were shut up in garrisons, and the Emperor, by some inexplicable infatuation, awaited 350,000 men before Leipsic, with a feeble and dispirited force scarcely amounting to 140,000. The day after his arrival at Leipsic, Napoleon gave the enemy battle before a village called Wachau, and was victorious. He now proposed an armistice to the Allied Sovereigns, and offered to evacuate Germany as far as the Rhine. But it was too late. They refused the proposed armistice.

Dismay pervaded the minds of all the Generals-in-Chief who surrounded Napoleon. A council was held by them, to which Berthier and M. Daru were summoned. They all agreed that he should do anything rather than come to an engagement. The conference being ended, Comte Daru and the Prince of Neufchâtel solicited an audience. Berthier represented the immense disadvantage of fighting with such an inferiority of force. He added that the Generals themselves were so disheartened that they were unable to animate the sinking courage of their troops; and he closed his picture by representing the terrible chance of a defeat opening to our enemies the road to Paris.

Encouraged by the silence of the Emperor, M. Daru spoke in his turn. He pointed out the destitute condition of the army, without a hospital in its rear, a circumstance which operated as a powerful discouragement to the troops. "Your Majesty is aware," pursued the Count, "that it is not my fault if we have not our accustomed resources. It is therefore necessary that we should come to a determination which, however mortifying it may be, is nevertheless urgent in present circumstances."

Napoleon looked for some moments at Comte Daru and the Prince of Neufchâtel, and then said: "Have you anything more to tell me?" They bowed, and made no reply. "Well, then, hear my answer. As to you, Berthier, you ought to know very well that your opinion on such a question has not the weight of a straw against my determination. You might therefore have spared yourself the trouble of speaking. You, Daru, should confine yourself to your pen, and not interfere with military matters. You are not qualified to judge in this affair. As to those who sent you, let them obey. This is my answer." He then dismissed them.

The next day the Battle of Leipsic was fought. What must have been Napoleon's feelings when he beheld a quarter of his troops pass over to the enemy, and point against their comrades the guns which had dealt death among the enemy's ranks only an hour before! In this manner the Battle of Leipsic may be said to have been both lost and gained by our army. The center* and the right were victorious. The left was abandoned by the Saxons in the middle of the battle, and delivered up to the enemy. The Battle of Leipsic, instead of being a defeat, may be said to have been one of Napoleon's most brilliant military achievements. At all events, the day was as glorious to him as it was disgraceful to those who so basely betrayed him; and, I may add, to those who so basely bought over the traitors.

The retreat was ordered, and it commenced in the most perfect order. Night was then drawing in. Before daylight the bridges were crossed, and all was proceeding without confusion, when an event, which has never yet been clearly explained, spread terror through the ranks of the French army. I allude to the blowing up of the bridge across the Elster. The subofficer by whom this act was committed, either from want of judgment, or, what is not improbable, being bribed by the enemy, was the sole author of the misfortune by which the rear of our army was sacrificed.

*The center was commanded by the Emperor in person, and the right by the King of Naples. For the space of seven hours they resisted upward of 270,000 men with a force of 9,500. The Prince of Sweden overpowered Marshal Ney on the left. The Marshal, nevertheless, defended himself for a considerable time with 40,000 men against 150,000.

This officer, who was directed to blow up the bridge across the Elster, stated that he was deceived by a party of Cossacks who had advanced and crossed the river; and the bridge was destroyed while ten thousand men were still engaged in defending the barriers of the suburbs to afford time to the reserve and the parks of artillery to pass, supposing the enemy to be still in possession of the city. This event, which separated the troops who had crossed the bridge from all the reserve, was a fatal blow to the French army. The rear guard, having no means of retreating, was at the mercy of the enemy. A frightful scene then ensued. The troops hurried in disorder to the western outlets of the plain, to reach the different passages of the arms of the river with which the road to France is intersected.

Whole battalions were made prisoners, and others were drowned. Marshal Macdonald saved himself by swimming. The Polish hero, Prince Poniatowski, perished here. He had been wounded in a charge made in the streets of the city, at the head of the Polish lancers, and arriving, feeble from loss of blood, on the banks of the Elster, and still anxious to protect the retreat of those who will always be proud to call him their brother-in-arms, he plunged into the river and was drowned.

An admirable trait in the life of Napoleon was the visit he made to the King of Saxony in passing through Leipsic. The venerable Sovereign was sinking under the weight of his grief for the treason of his countrymen. Napoleon knew him too well to attribute to him any share of the odium of that disgraceful defection. He said all he could to console the Nestor of Germany. But this visit, which the King prided himself on having received, brought upon him a cruel revenge. He was overwhelmed with every species of insult, and was even punished as a traitor for no other reason than that he had not been guilty of treason.

The unfortunate old monarch was made prisoner by the Allied Sovereigns, and condemned like a criminal to forfeit one-half of his States. This sentence was executed. The Prince Royal of Sweden was one of the most severe at that council of Kings who now began to strike indiscriminately those whom they had acknowledged and addressed as "Brother."

The French army, the amount of which at Leipsic was between 140,000 and 150,000 men, scarcely numbered 90,000 on its arrival at Erfurth. Fresh supplies of provisions and ammunition helped to revive the drooping spirits of the troops, and they continued their march toward France. On the 2d of November the army crossed the Rhine. This at least was a strong barrier. But alas! it had not been respected by our ambition, could we then hope that vengeance would respect it?

On the 3d of November the Emperor arrived at Mayence. This was the second time that he had entered his Empire as a fugitive. But in the previous year his situation was very different from what it was at present. Then he had still great resources in his power which might enable him to command immense results. Now all was lost!

I received from Mayence a letter which assured me that he was profoundly dejected. While at Mayence he received intelligence of the surrender of Pampeluna. The fall of that fortress secured the liberation of Western Spain. The surrender was caused by want of provisions. This event augmented Napoleon's melancholy. He immediately left Mayence, and pursued his journey to Saint Cloud. There news of a still more mortifying nature awaited him. The lines of Saint Jean de Luz, commanded by Marshal Soult, had been forced by Wellington. The French were now entirely driven out of Spain.

At this moment Heaven visited us with another disaster! The typhus fever swept away, in the space of six weeks, upward of 40,000 men, who were crowded together in the hospitals on the banks of the Rhine. The malady prevailed not only on the Rhine; it likewise extended its deadly ravages along the Elbe. Marshal Saint Cyr, who was shut up in Dresden with 30,000 men, had 6,000 sick.* He was obliged to capitulate.

And what was the consequence? The capitulation, concluded by Generals Tolstoi and Klemann, was not ratified by the Generalissimo, Prince Schwartzberg, who, abusing his title as Commander-in-Chief, did not scruple to make his lieutenants perjure themselves. The treacherous conduct of Prince Schwartzberg soon found imitators. On the 1st of January, 1814, the Prince of Wirtemberg signed a capitulation with Rapp, at Dantzic, and afterward refused to execute it.

Holland was now evacuated. General Mollitor, with 14,000 men, could no longer resist General Bulow, who had 60,000. The House of Orange was recalled. Dantzic—Dresden—all had capitulated, and all had been betrayed. There remained not a single friend to France on the other side of the Rhine. Denmark herself, so long faithful to us, the friend of the Committee of Public Safety, and the ally of Robespierre—Denmark had not courage to adhere to Napoleon in his misfortune.

The Emperor arrived at Saint Cloud on the 9th of November, and lost not a moment in adopting the necessary steps for the defense of France. He saw the necessity of organizing a system of security in Paris. To extreme dangers he determined to apply extreme remedies. On the 15th of December the Senate had placed 300,000 conscripts at Napoleon's disposal. On the 2d of December the Emperor had notified to Count Metternich his willingness to accept the conditions of Frankfort. As a guarantee of his intentions he liberated Ferdinand VII., and on the 11th of December he signed the Treaty of Valençay. On the 19th of December the Legislative Body was opened by the Emperor in person.

For a long time previously the conduct of Murat had been such as to excite the suspicion that he meditated defection. England, ever ready to seize at anything which might accelerate the fall of Napoleon, eagerly strove to bring to maturity this new germ of misfortune. Agents were sent to Italy: the condition of its different provinces was easily revealed, especially at the moment when the typhus fever had swept away almost the whole of that army which Prince Eugène had sent to Germany in the spring of the same year. A deep-laid plan was then conceived; and to render the blow more severe to Napoleon, it was intended that the hand of Murat should inflict it.

Lord Castlereagh, like an able Minister as he was, perfectly understood the importance not only of gaining over Murat, but of maintaining him where he was. Murat had entered into some negotiations with England, and the preliminaries of a treaty had been exchanged. Of this treaty the following were the bases:

England was to acknowledge Joachim Murat as King of Naples, and to pledge herself to obtain a similar acknowledgment from Ferdinand, who was to abandon the Neapolitan States, and retire to Sicily. The Kingdom of Naples was to be augmented by the whole of the Marshes of Ancona. Italy was to be declared independent, and all the little sovereignties restored as they were before the conquest. To aid the fulfillment of this latter clause, England was to advance twenty millions to Murat for the expenses of the war which he would probably have to enter upon, and to place an army of twenty-five thousand men at his disposal.

Admiral Bentinck, Commander-in-Chief of the British forces in the Mediterranean, was instructed to pursue this negotiation, in which England evinced a deep interest. M. de la Vauguyon, who was then master of Rome, where he had succeeded General Miollis in the command of the Papal States, used all his efforts to bring Murat to a decision. But his courier repeatedly returned without any satisfactory answer. Nothing seemed to indicate any assurance that King Joachim would adopt the course which he (Vauguyon) regarded as the only one fitting for him to follow. Mention was even made of a treaty with Austria. M. von Mire, the Austrian Minister at Naples, had acquired an ascendancy over the Queen which he turned to the disadvantage of his own Sovereign; and Murat's weakness ruined him in this most important juncture of his life.

M. de la Vauguyon remained in Rome, anxiously waiting until it should please Murat to come to a decision.

giving no intelligence, he began to be uneasy, when day his valet de chambre announced that there were strangers waiting, who earnestly requested to see him immediately. "Have you told them I am dressing?" said the Duke. "Yes," replied the valet; "but they say I will wait."

The Duc de la Vauguyon continued dressing, without hurry. At the least, when a second message, somewhat peremptory, was sent to him. He then stepped into his cabinet, and desired his valet to usher in the two strangers. He beheld before him two men of very comely appearance; one of them, who was of short stature, addressed him in an accent which betrayed him to be an Englishman:

"I have requested this interview, Duke, with some sense of urgency, because I have but a very short time to remain here; but it is necessary that I should speak to you, since I cannot obtain any intelligence from King Louis. I am Admiral Bentinck." The Duc de la Vauguyon made every apology for the delay, but in truth his astonishment almost overwhelmed him.

"General," continued Admiral Bentinck, "King Joazeff does not behave well to my Government. He knows what he may expect from England, and he ought to act with more candor and energy. In the crisis in which Europe at present stands, it is urgent that the affairs of France should be promptly decided. We offer twenty-five millions in money, and twenty-five thousand troops. Will your King accept these propositions, and with them the friendship of the English Government? He ought to be aware that the alliance of Great Britain will secure him the assistance of all the other Sovereigns of Europe. From whom would he wish to derive his power? From England or from Austria? He must promptly decide. The step I have now taken proves my personal esteem for your character by thus trusting to your honor; it likewise shows the interest I feel for the success of what has been so happily begun."

The Duc de la Vauguyon assured Admiral Bentinck that he had spared no endeavor to bring the King of France to the wished-for decision. Bentinck was probably aware of this. It was his confidence in the noble character of the Duke, and his personal desire to see the settled, which induced him to hazard a step might have led to his imprisonment. But the had placed confidence in the honor of M. de la on, and that shield was sacred.

Admiral's boat was waiting for him at Civita and he departed, recommending the Duke to endeavors to secure the INTERESTS OF ITALY. That was the Duke's disappointment, when, after dispatched a letter to Joachim, more urgent than there arrived in Rome one of the King's aids- , who merely passed through the city, and was to the Austrian advanced posts the ratification treaty which Murat had signed with Austria! this time Comte Louis de Narbonne died. He recovering from an attack of typhus fever, e met with a fall from his horse which led to a ult.

Comte was survived by his mother, the Duchesse onne, who was a woman of extraordinary energy cter. She had returned to France after the death Princesses, to whom she was devotedly attached. n treated her with the most unremitting and af- te attention. She detested the Emperor, and, in her fondness for her son, she could never par- n for having attached himself to the Imperial Napoleon knew this, and he used often to jest mte Louis at the old Duchess's prejudice.

death of the Comte de Narbonne was more deeply Napoleon, inasmuch as he thought it had been hastened by his appointment at Torgau. He wished, if possible, to mitigate the shock which he knew the intelligence would occasion to the venerable Duchess, who was then in her eightieth year. He inquired who would be the fittest person to convey to her intimation of her melancholy loss. He was told that she had already been informed of it. He then sent for General Flahaut, and directed him to go immediately to pay a visit to the Duchess, and to give her every assurance of his (Napoleon's) condolence for the misfortune that had befallen her.

M. de Flahaut acquitted himself of his mission, though he undertook it with a degree of repugnance that might easily be accounted for. He knew the spirit of the Duchesse de Narbonne, and he feared that she might reply to the Emperor's message in a way that would be painful for him to hear, and which he could not repeat to the Emperor.

When the Duchess saw M. de Flahaut, she betrayed considerable emotion. She advanced a few steps toward him, but was obliged to support herself by resting her hand on a table.

"Madame," said General de Flahaut, when he had conducted her to her chair, "I am sent hither by the Emperor to express to you his sincere sympathy for the melancholy loss you have sustained."

The Duchess bowed her head, and uttered some words which M. de Flahaut did not distinctly hear. After the lapse of a few moments, when she appeared more composed, he added:

"His Majesty desires, madame, that you will inform him how he can serve you—in short, what he can do for you?"

The Duchess turned red, then pale, and was evidently struggling to conceal the agitation of her feelings.

"I can only return thanks," said she, cautiously avoiding to pronounce the name of the Emperor. "I do not, and I never will, ask for anything; but," added she, with admirable dignity, "my circumstances enjoin me to refuse nothing."

The Emperor immediately granted her a pension of 2,000 francs.

This is not a solitary example of Napoleon's benevolence. He was one day informed that the widow of a marshal was living in Paris in circumstances of indigence. This was Madame de Mailly. He immediately ordered the War Minister to place her name on the pension list of widows of the great officers of the empire. This gave her an annuity of 20,000 francs.

When Louis XVIII. returned to France, Madame de Narbonne, whose attachment to the exiled family had not been abated, and who had given repeated proofs of the most disinterested devotedness, went to pay her respects to the King with the certainty of being received with distinguished attention. His Majesty, indeed, said many gracious things to her; and, taking her by the hand, told her that he would do something to ameliorate her circumstances. Two days afterward he sent her 50,000 francs. This was precisely the interest at five per cent of the salary which the Comte de Narbonne had received as aid-de-camp to the Emperor. This recollection was anything but pleasing to the Duchess, and I have been assured that she sent the money back.

I must relate one more anecdote of the Duchesse de Narbonne and Napoleon. On the 21st of March, 1815, the streets of Paris still re-echoed the shouts of a joyous population. It was half-past six in the evening. The Duchesse de Narbonne had just risen from dinner, and had no company with her but Dr. Kappeler. The doctor offered her his arm, and conducted her to her favourite armchair, which was wheeled to the window. She resided in the Rue Ferme-des-Mathurins. The doctor took his seat beside her, and listened, as he always did, with renewed interest to those stories of the times which she, as well as her son, related so delightfully. Once or twice the Doctor adverted to the Emperor's return, which, of course, was the engrossing subject of conversation everywhere; but whenever he alluded to the subject the Duchess frowned, and, in the reproachful tone of a woman of eighty-three, said: "Doctor, let us talk of something else."

Suddenly a carriage drove up to the door, and in a few moments the valet de chambre announced the Grand Marshal. General Bertrand then filled that post. He was one of the most well-bred and kind-hearted of men. He advanced to the Duchess with all the respectful gallantry of a courtier of Versailles, and told her he had been sent by HIS MAJESTY THE EMPEROR to inquire how she was, and to know whether she had been taken care of in his absence. He also begged her to inform him whether he could do anything for her.

The interview was short; but it made a profound impression on the Duchesse de Narbonne. As soon as the Grand-Marshal was gone, she summoned Doctor Kappeler, who had retired into an adjoining room.

"Do you know, Doctor, that THAT man is not so very bad? What do you think? He arrived only yesterday evening, and amid all his occupations and embarrassments he has thought of me—of one who he knows dislikes him! That is really very generous."

But the Hundred Days passed away, and there was another return; and perhaps General Bertrand's visit to Madame de Narbonne was recollected with displeasure by the restored Court. Such, at least, may be presumed to have been the fact, from the sort of refusal which was given to an application for 30,000 francs due to the Duchesse de Narbonne; and due to her the more justly, because her conduct at the death of Madame Adelaide had been truly noble. She had sent to Mittau, where Louis XVIII. and the Duchesse d'Angoulême then were, the property which she became possessed of in virtue of her office, and which she was the better entitled to, inasmuch as she had lost all her own fortune by following her royal mistress in exile.

She counted confidently on the receipt of the 30,000 francs due to her, and when she was informed that the payment was indefinitely delayed, the intelligence proved a fatal disappointment to her. In the morning, when the Doctor went out after breakfast, he left her well. On his return at five o'clock he found her stricken with the hand of death. He loved her with the affection of a son, and he employed all the resources of his art to restore that energy which was the essence of her existence; but it was extinguished. All that he could do was to prolong her life for the space of two months. She then expired, at the age of eighty-four, possessing all her faculties as perfectly as if she had been but thirty.

I WAS now in the sixth month of my widowhood, and since Junot's death I had lived in perfect seclusion.

I did not even occupy those apartments of my Hôtel which looked toward the street; but my friends called upon me every day and brought me intelligence of what was going on. I was regularly informed of our progressive degrees of misfortune, and the information was truly appalling. One day Lavalette called on me and said, in a tone of despair, that all was lost. I was astonished to see him so dejected, for he was generally in good spirits.

"Blucher," continued he, "has crossed the Rhine at the head of a formidable army—the Army of Silesia! It appears that nothing has opposed him, and that he has effected the passage from Mannheim to Coblenz without encountering the slightest obstacle." "Heavens!" exclaimed I; "is France no longer France! Are we not the same people who, in 1792, forced the Prussians to recross the frontier?"

Blucher's army amounted to 160,000 men; yet it was only the second in force. Among the hosts who were pouring down upon us with all the fury of vengeance, the Grand Army, commanded by Prince Schwartzemberg, amounted to 190,000 men; the Army of the North, commanded by Bernadotte, counted 130,000; then there were 100,000 troops headed by Generals Beningsen and Taeunzien; General Bellegarde had 80,000 men in Italy; and the German, Polish, Dutch, and Russian reserves presented altogether about 800,000 troops. To this astonishing army may be added 200,000 Spaniards, Portuguese, and English, commanded by Wellington, who were thirsting for vengeance at the barrier of the Pyrenees, as Blucher was on that of the Rhine.

To this menacing invasion what forces had we to oppose? No more than 350,000 men! And how were they disposed? One hundred thousand were shut up in the fortresses of Hamburg and Dantzic, beyond the Oder, the Elbe, and the Rhine. Prince Eugène had a feeble army in Italy to oppose to Murat and Bellegarde. Soult and Suchet had scarcely 80,000 men to encounter the formidable army of Wellington. The Emperor had under his direct command the corps of Marshals Ney, Marmont, Macdonald, Mortier, Victor, and Augereau. But what was the force of these army corps?

Marshal Ney's scarcely amounted to 14,000 men, Marshal Augereau's did not amount to 3,000, and the Imperial Guard was included in these numbers. Thus, to resist all Europe in arms against us, we had only an army in which each man counted four adversaries. Patriotism, it is true, might still do much; but personal misfortunes had unnerved us. We were no longer ourselves. Amid all these troubles and terrors, amid the distant roar of Russian and Prussian cannon, arrived the last day of the year 1813.

On the first day of January, 1814, Napoleon for the last time received the New Year's homage of his Court. There was a pretty numerous attendance at the Tuileries. When all the company had arrived, the Emperor entered from the inner apartments. His manner was calm and grave, but on his brow there sat a cloud which denoted an approaching storm. Napoleon had appointed two Committees to draw up a report on the state of France. These Committees were formed from members of the Senate and the Legislative Body.

The Committee for the Senate was composed of MM. de Talleyrand, Fontanes, Saint Marsan, Barbé Marbois, and Beurnonville, and was presided over by M. de Lacépède. The Committee for the Legislative Body consisted of MM. Raynouard, Lainé, Gallois, Flauguergues, and Maine de Biran, and the President was the Duc de Masso. M. Raynouard was the orator of the Legislative Body, and he spoke with a degree of candor and energy which was calculated to produce a fatal impression on the rest of France. The Emperor immediately felt this. The report of M. Raynouard likewise contained expressions disrespectful to the Emperor, the effect of which could not fail to be like a tocsin summoning the the people to revolt.

The Emperor said nothing the first day on learning what had passed in the Legislative Body; but on the 1st of January, when all the authorities of the Empire were assembled in the Salle du Trône, he delivered a speech, the violence of which filled the offenders with dismay:

"I have suppressed the printing of your address," said he; "it was of an incendiary nature. Eleven-twelfths of the Legislative Body are, I know, composed of good citizens, and I attach no blame to them; but the other twelfth is a factious party, and your Committee was selected from that number. That man named Lainé is in correspondence with the Prince Regent through the medium of the Advocate de Sêze. I have proofs of this fact. The report of the Committee has hurt me exceedingly. I would rather have lost two battles. What does it tend to? To strengthen the pretensions of the enemy. If I were to be guided by it I should concede more than the enemy demands. Because he asks for the province of Champagne would you have me surrender that of Brie? Would you make remonstrances in the presence of the enemy? Your object was to humiliate me! My life may be sacrificed, but never my honor. I was not born in the rank of Kings; I do not depend on the Throne. What is a throne? A few deal boards covered with velvet. Four months hence, and I will publish the odious report of your Committee. The vengeance of the enemy is directed against my person, more than against the French people. But, for that reason, should I be justified in dismembering the State? Must I sacrifice my pride to obtain peace? I am proud, because I am brave. I am proud, because I have done great things for France. In a word, France has more need of me than I have need of her. In three months we shall have peace, or I shall be dead. Go to your homes;—it was not thus you should have rebuked me.”*

The Legislative Body, though mute that day, was nevertheless the organ of the nation. The Committee had been maladroit in speaking as it did; but Napoleon was no less so in his reply, which, though it did not appear in the “Moniteur” as it was delivered, was nevertheless known throughout Europe eight days afterward. It was like issuing a manifesto against France, while he ought to have held out to her a friendly hand in the hour of her distress, when both mutually required support. The Emperor’s reply, which was speedily circulated throughout Paris, gave rise to a multitude of commentaries. It was like the signal of discord.

To the honor of Napoleon, it must be mentioned that though he has been held up as a tyrant, ever ready to punish, and as a despot exercising the most arbitrary self-will, yet this incident was followed by no measures of severity. Among the members of the Committee there were men who might justly have incurred punishment. M. Lainé had been actively engaged at Bordeaux, at the head of a Royalist faction, and was about to resume his exertions. The Emperor knew this, and perhaps he did wrong not to detain him in Paris.

But I say again that the Emperor’s disposition was not naturally tyrannical. He no doubt frequently adopted the most arbitrary measures, but in those instances it will be found that he was usually influenced by reports which obscured the truth and biased his judgment. When left to himself to make a decision, it was almost invariably noble and generous.

On the 1st of January the brave General Rapp was obliged to allow the Russians to enter Dantzic after a most heroic resistance. The besieged were allowed to return to France with the honors of war, taking with them their arms and baggage. None of these conditions were observed; all were violated, and the garrison was sent to Siberia! It is curious to note the three flagrant violations of treaties which took place during the time that Europe waged war against us.

* See also Bourrienne’s “Memoirs of Napoleon Bonaparte” (edition of 1885), Vol. III., pp. 83, 84.

The first instance occurred in Egypt, at the treaty of El-Arish, by Admiral Keith, and the brave Klèber. The second was the violation of the treaty by Prince Schwartzemberg at Dresden. The third, and perhaps the most dishonorable, if there can be any difference in a breach of faith, was the violation of the Convention of Dantzic. It is honorable to the character of the French, as a nation, that during the twenty-two years in which we warred against the whole of Europe, our enemies cannot accuse us of a similar breach of faith. Our generals maintained their pride, even amid perils and reverses; for true honor will never appeal to necessity as an apology for a dereliction from duty.

Every day we learned the progress of the Allies from private letters, for the "Moniteur" still drew a veil over the truth. The line of hostile lances and bayonets was hourly more and more closely drawn, and we beheld the danger without seeing how it could be averted. Napoleon organized one hundred and twenty thousand of the National Guards to cover Lyons and Paris, and to form a reserve. This was our last resource! The enemy had been for some time in possession of Langres, Dijon, Chalons, Nancy, and Vaucouleurs, and threatened immediately to march on Paris. Blucher had established his forces at Saint Dizier and Joinville.

On learning that the Austrians were in possession of Bar-sur-Aube, the Emperor determined to quit Paris. He had already liberated the King of Spain and the Pope; Ferdinand VII. had left Valençay, and Pius VII. had departed from Fontainebleau. By this measure Napoleon hoped to secure the friendship of a man who had been guilty of deposing his own father. Ferdinand, however, remained his enemy.

Nothing is more curious than to observe the sudden coldness of feeling which some persons betrayed toward Napoleon the moment his happy star began to grow dim. In one day I heard ten different versions of the manner in which he took leave of the National Guard, and confided his wife and child to their protection. Many, who had witnessed the scene, returned from it with tears in their eyes; while others regarded as affectation the burst of sensibility which he had evinced when he presented his son to the National Guard.

If I had seen him I could have guessed whether his feelings were genuine or not, for I knew him too well to be deceived. But from all that I heard, I should be inclined to say that he was really animated by the sentiments he manifested. He was a father, and he doted on his child. His heart must have been moved when he gazed on the lovely boy who had been destined at his birth to wear twenty crowns, but who had been dispossessed of his inheritance by those who were his natural protectors. Whatever may now be said of Napoleon's farewell to the National Guard, there can be no doubt that the enthusiasm of the Parisians was that day at its height.

No person who was then in the capital can forget the prolonged shouts of Vive l'Empereur! Vive le Roi de Rome! The Place du Carrousel resounded with the oaths of fidelity taken by the officers of the National Guard; and yet, before a few weeks elapsed, these oaths, so solemnly pledged, were betrayed and forgotten.

Napoleon was anxious to make one more attempt to bring the Allied Sovereigns to something like reasonable conditions: and he accordingly sent the Duke of Vicenza to the headquarters of the Allied army. The Duke was a favorite of the Emperor Alexander, and Napoleon was perfectly aware of the importance of regaining the friendship of the Sovereign of Russia. Alas! why did he ever lose it? Alexander loved him as a brother. Be this as it may, the Duke of Vicenza was on such a footing with the Emperor Alexander as enabled him to make propositions of peace and friendship with some probability of success. Napoleon, with the view of giving more dignity to the Duke, appointed him his Minister for Foreign Affairs.

It now became necessary that the Emperor should have near him a Minister to correspond with the Plenipotentiary. The Duke of Vicenza could scarcely expect that the Emperor could himself maintain the diplomatic correspondence amid the rapid operations of the prodigious campaign. The Duke of Bassano was nominated to this duty.

About the time when Murat leagued with the enemies of France, a curious scene took place in the interior of the Palace of Naples. Of this scene I here present to the reader an accurate description, derived from one of the actors in it, and there were but three. I allude to Madame Récamier, who during her exile, having no hope of seeing Madame de Staël at Coppet, determined to proceed to Italy—to visit Naples with its beautiful bay—and to see Vesuvius. On her arrival at Naples, Madame Récamier fixed her abode at the Hôtel de l'Europe, on the Chiaia.

On the morning after her arrival, she was visited by the Neapolitan Minister for Foreign Affairs, who waited upon her by order of the King and Queen, to invite her to the Palace. Madame Récamier, was more annoyed than flattered by this mark of royal graciousness. She had known Murat, but he had never been one of her intimate friends. Indeed, Murat's elevation to royalty had been so sudden that he had been speedily removed from the sphere of all his early connections. He had at one period of his life admired Madame Récamier, and had even made love to her, as he did to every attractive woman of his acquaintance; but she gave him to understand that his attentions were not acceptable, and he took the hint with a good grace.

It was now very long since Madame Récamier had seen him. As to the Queen, she had scarcely any personal acquaintance with her, and she could not be expected to entertain any very strong predilection for the sister of the man who had persecuted her and all her friends. It was therefore with feelings rather painful than gratifying that she repaired to the Palace. She accepted the invitation because she would not treat with incivility a mark of courtesy shown to her in a foreign land during her exile.

The Queen of Naples was a woman of considerable shrewdness, energy of character, and talent. I use this latter term in reference to her political life only. That excepted, she was as ignorant as a woman can well be, or, I ought rather to say, as women were a hundred years ago. Though wanting in the most ordinary education, yet, if a grave political question came under discussion, she could speak like a well-informed statesman.

Queen Caroline had a peculiarity of manner and temper which was very far from agreeable. I allude to her habit of ridiculing and teasing her acquaintances.

For my own part, I can truly say that I was always nervous for a week after we had any of our rehearsals of plays or quadrilles. This disposition, which she indulged to a most disagreeable extent, created for her more enemies than her beauty. One may accommodate one's self to a rivalry, especially if there be nothing very superior in it; but to be continually reminded of that superiority is insufferable, particularly when one has not altogether a contemptible opinion of one's self.

Caroline received Madame Récamier with transport. Madame Récamier was touched by the kind reception she experienced, and expressed her heartfelt gratitude to the Queen of Naples. "Ah!" said Caroline; "I shall perhaps soon have to solicit a proof of your friendship; I hope you will not withhold it. I shall be much in need of it."

This was on the 16th of January. Everything that was said in the Palace was a subject of conversation in Naples, and all the gossip in the city was faithfully reported in the Palace. "He must abandon the Emperor," exclaimed the populace. "We will no longer be dragged from our homes to fight at the other end of the world. We must have peace."

These shouts for peace were, by a curious anomaly, raised by men armed with stilettoes, which they brandished with threatening attitudes in front of the Palace of Joachim, the popular King—the King of Feathers—who was a great favorite with the Lazzaroni del Carmine. His smiling, good-humored countenance, his fantastic costume—in short, all his peculiarities—recommended him strongly to that class of his subjects above mentioned.

Besides, Murat was a man of amiable disposition; he was a good husband and a good father. But, after all, the love of his subjects was ephemeral, and it was chilled by the fear of war and the English invasion. Murmurs increased ever day, and Murat could not go out of his Palace without encountering dissatisfied groups. Such was the state of things when Madame Récamier arrived at Naples.

In compliance with the invitation she had received, she proceeded to the Palace about noon. She found the Queen as amiable and as gracious as before. Nobody better understood the art of captivating those whom she wished to gain over to her interests than the Queen of Naples. She possessed this great charm in common with her brother Napoleon. Her apartments in the Palace were fitted up with luxurious taste. Her bedchamber, which commanded a view of the bay, was hung with white satin, the rich soft folds of which harmonized admirably with the brilliant complexion of the mistress of the apartment. She frequently received visitors while in bed, as she had been in the habit of doing in Paris. Her bed-curtains were of richly worked tulle, lined with pink satin.

On receiving Madame Récamier, Caroline expressed her regret at seeing her in exile, but assured her that the hardships of that exile would be considerably mitigated by her residence in Naples. Murat, too, who was present at the interview, gave her every assurance of the interest he felt in her behalf. When Madame Récamier took her leave, the King and Queen invited her to visit them again on the following day. She could easily perceive that very uneasy feelings prevailed in the interior of the Palace. Public report, indeed, had Madame Récamier lent ear to it, would have informed her that happiness was not an inmate of the royal abode, splendid as it was.

On the following day, as she proceeded to the Palace, everything presented a strange aspect, from the quay of the Chiaia to the steps of the throne. Being a stranger in the country, and unacquainted with the turbulent habits of the people, she was half inclined to return home when she beheld the agitation which prevailed. She passed through several apartments of the Palace without seeing a chamberlain.

At length she reached the door of the Queen's chamber; she tapped gently, and Caroline herself, who anxiously expected her, opened the door. As soon as she entered she was struck with the extraordinary picture that presented itself. The King and Queen were alone. Murat was pale, his hair disordered, his eyes rolling wildly, and to all appearance he was under the influence of some overpowering excitement. The Queen, on her part, was very pale, and much agitated, but her superior fortitude was evident in every glance which she darted on her husband—that man to whom Napoleon justly said: "You are brave only on the field of battle—in any other situation you have not the courage of a woman or monk."

"In the name of Heaven! for the sake of your own glory! remain here, I implore you; and do not show yourself in this state!" exclaimed Caroline to her husband, on the entrance of Madame Récamier. "Would you wish to convince the Neapolitans that they have a King who is not worthy of the name? Stay where you are, I conjure you." These words, I CONJURE YOU, were uttered in the authoritative tone of I DESIRE YOU. "Pray stay with him for a few moments," said the Queen to Madame Récamier; "I am going to give a few orders, and will return immediately."

No sooner had Caroline left the room than Murat flew to Madame Récamier, and, taking her by the two hands, said, with the deepest emotion: "Tell me—tell me the truth—it is certain that you must think I have behaved very basely. Is it not so?" "Be composed," said Madame Récamier; "why this agitation? What has happened?" "Alas!" continued the unfortunate Murat, sinking into a chair, "does not all France vent anathemas on my head! Am I not called Murat the traitor—Murat the renegade?" He hid his face in his hands and burst into tears.

On seeing this violent agitation, Madame Récamier immediately suspected that he had not determined to sign the treaty with Austria and England, a treaty which was calculated to alienate him and his children from France; for it would require more than the interval of a generation to wipe away such a stain. With her accustomed good sense, she immediately perceived that a little calm advice offered by a friend, who, like herself, had no personal interest in the question at issue, might give a fixed direction to his wavering sentiments.

"Do you ask me for my opinion?" said she with a serious air. "Ah! give it me," he exclaimed eagerly, "draw me from the gulf that yawns before me. On all sides I see nothing but misfortune and disaster." "Hear me, then," resumed Madame Récamier; "you know that I do not like the Emperor! I am myself an exile, and my friends are proscribed. All who are dear to me have been plunged into misery by Napoleon. But still, in spite of these considerations, I will give you the same advice which I would give to my own brother in the like circumstances—you ought not to forsake the Emperor. No, I say again you ought not to forsake him!”

As she uttered these words Murat became more and more pale. He looked at her for some moments without making any reply. Then, rising with impetuosity, he took her hand, and led her to the balcony before the window, and, pointing to the Bay of Naples, already filled with English ships, he exclaimed in a voice half stifled with emotion: “Behold! look yonder! and now tell me whether this is the moment when France should address to me the title of TRAITOR!”

Madame Récamier was astounded at what she heard, for, judging from all that she had had an opportunity of observing within the past hour, she confidently believed that Murat had not yet come to any decision; and yet the English ships hoisted their flags in the very port of his capital. She said nothing. What, indeed, could she have said—she who never spoke but in sincerity and candor?

Murat seemed perfectly bewildered with despair and grief, when the Queen suddenly entered. She also was deadly pale. On perceiving the King in the pitiable state in which he was she trembled, and, running up to him, exclaimed: “In the name of Heaven, Joachim, be silent, or at least speak lower! In the adjoining room there are a hundred ears listening to you. Be silent! Have you lost all self-command?”

Finding she could produce no effect upon him, she ran to a table on which was some water, sugar, and orange-flower water. She herself mixed a portion, and, pouring into it some drops of ether, she brought it to him: “Drink this and compose yourself,” said she. “The crisis has now arrived. Murat, recollect what you are. You are King of Naples. Do not lose sight of the duty you owe to your subjects and to your family. Hear me! In six weeks, perhaps, the Emperor may himself be in Italy.” At this sharp apostrophe Murat again trembled. “What ails you?” resumed Caroline. “What are you afraid of? Reflect on your situation. View it as it really is. The worst you have to fear is to find yourself face to face with the Emperor. Well, then! Suppose he were now only fifty leagues from Naples, and that you are going to mount your horse to meet him."

Murat hid his face in his hands. "How! You dare not face him?" said Caroline, with a gesture of contempt. "Then I will do so for you! Yes, I will mount my horse. I will place myself at the head of the army, and I will go to the Emperor and ask him by WHAT RIGHT he takes from me that which he gave as a reward for the blood you have shed for his glory!" Madame Récamier gazed at her with painful astonishment, and could not help exclaiming: "Oh, Madame!" The Queen understood the reproach conveyed in these words. She paced two or three times up and down the apartment, and then, as if in reply to Madame Récamier, she said: "Doubtless I am his sister. I know it but too well. Yet why did he give me a Crown? If I am his sister I am likewise Queen of Naples!"

Then, as if overcome by the weight of so many distressing sensations, she threw herself on a sofa and was silent. Presently a sort of murmur was heard on the quay. Caroline rose suddenly, ran to Murat, and, looking at him steadfastly, said: "Now you may show yourself. Go, my dear Joachim—and recollect who you are!" Murat rose, passed his hand through his hair, and stepped up to a mirror to adjust the deranged appearance of his cravat. He then embraced the Queen, and, taking Madame Récamier's hand, he said to her with a tone of sincere kindness: "You will return and dine with us. We shall be alone; do not refuse."

Madame Récamier promised, and Murat then took leave of her and the Queen. When he had passed the folds of the satin curtains which were drawn over the door, the Queen rushed into the arms of Madame Récamier, and shed a torrent of tears. "You see," said she, "I am obliged to have courage for him as well as myself! At a time, too, when my own fortitude is scarcely borne up even by my affection for my children—when I am hourly distracted by thinking of my brother, who believes me to be guilty of treason to him. Oh, pity me! I have need of pity, and I deserve it. If you could search my heart, you would see what torture I am doomed to bear!"

On returning to her Hôtel, Madame Récamier was absorbed in agitating reflections. Suddenly her attention was roused by a noise in the street. She ran to the window, and saw the whole population of the Carmine* and Santa Lucia assembled round Murat, who was parading the city on horseback. The intelligence of the treaty of alliance, confirmed by the presence of the English ships in the port, had excited the populace, and their enthusiasm for Murat and the Queen was at its height. The King was still pale, but he appeared in good spirits; as he passed the balcony of Madame Récamier, he looked up and gracefully saluted her.

WE ARE NOW on the eve of the most heart-rending period of the brilliant career of the Emperor. No more balls at the Imperial Palace, the silence and the solitude of whose walls were now disturbed only by the voice of that beautiful child, which was also to be stifled in exile. The fatal cordon of hostile forces by which we were surrounded approached us more and more. One day we learned that the Wirtemberg troops had entered Epinal; another time that the Prussians were masters of Nancy, of Chalons-sur-Saône, and that the Austrians were in Chambéry. The Army of Silesia, commanded by Blücher, established itself in the vicinity of Paris, for so we may term Saint Dizier and Joinville. The enemy was at length on the Marne. Then the Emperor quitted Paris!

He had long hesitated before he adopted this course, either because he was waiting to see the effect of the negotiations opened at Frankfort, or because he hoped that there would be a general rising in France at the sight of the foreign invaders. Doubtless this was naturally to be expected from the bravery and energy of the French people. But he himself had worn out all their springs of action—they had lost their elasticity. The most determined and the most active required repose; a general desire for it prevailed from the cottage of the soldier to the palace of the Marshal. Napoleon never could be brought to understand the law of necessity. He endeavored to make everything yield to him, while he himself would never bend to circumstances.

At this time Parisian society presented an extraordinary aspect. Grief and alarm now prevailed in those houses which had but recently been the scenes of uninterrupted festivity. The numerous families arrayed in mourning cast a gloom over the streets and public promenades, and it was particularly melancholy to observe the many young females who wore widow's weeds. This last circumstance struck the Emperor of Russia, as he himself informed me. While the Emperor was in Champagne, exhibiting a last proof of that talent and energy which had raised him to one of the first thrones in the world, M. de Talleyrand remained in Paris, and his intrigues gave the finishing stroke to Napoleon's misfortunes.

It is said that the Emperor, on the eve of his departure to join the army, summoned M. de Talleyrand to the Tuileries, and there spoke to him, in a tone that might be called more than firm, of the affairs of Spain. It would appear that the Emperor was not at that time very well acquainted with the style of conversation which was maintained in the coterie of M. de Talleyrand when the affairs of Spain came under discussion.

"Well, Monsieur de Talleyrand," said the Emperor, walking straight up to him, "I think it is somewhat strange that you should allege I made you the gaoler of Ferdinand, when you yourself made the proposition to me!" Talleyrand assumed one of his inscrutable looks;

who dance attendance upon royalty differ but little from servants of any other kind. As I was myself lady of honor to a Princess, I may attack this class of people without the fear of being thought unjust or prejudiced; and I have often thought, when we were assembled in the salon de service, gossiping about what did not concern us, that we very much resembled those who were amusing themselves in a similar way in the story below us.

However this may be, it is nevertheless certain that the Chamberlain on duty at the Tuileries, whose name I need not mention, reported that the Prince of Benevento had received a coup de poing from the Emperor. M. de Talleyrand, as I have already observed, had a party that same evening, and one of the visitors, who was on familiar terms with the Prince, stepped up to him, saying, "Ah, Monseigneur, what have I heard?" "What?" inquired the Prince, with one of his cool, impenetrable looks. "I have been informed that the Emperor treated you——" "Oh," interrupted the Prince, "that is a thing that happens every day—every day." The Prince had heard no mention of the coup de poing, of which he flattered himself nobody knew; and when he said "every day," he merely meant that the Emperor was out of temper and unreasonable every day.

M. de Talleyrand's friend, however, who had no very refined notions of etiquette, as may be readily imagined from his address to the Prince, took it into his head that Talleyrand was in the daily habit of receiving a box on the ear from the Emperor. This mistake gave rise to a fund of merriment when it came to be reported that the Prince of Benevento daily submitted to the Emperor's correction with that indifference which might be inferred from the negligent shrug of the shoulders that accompanied the words, "Every day!—Mon Dieu!—Every day!"

I am not competent to judge of the merits of the military movements made by the Emperor in Champagne, but I have heard it alleged that his genius never was so brilliantly displayed as in that campaign. He drove the Prussians from Saint Dizier, and this triumph was almost immediately followed by the Battle of Brienne. What painful feelings must have arisen in his mind while he was fighting to preserve his Crown under the walls of the old college where, in his boyhood, he had passed so many happy hours! At Brienne he had also fought battles, but they were followed by no pangs of grief or remorse. His soldiers were his college companions, his ammunition snowballs, and the ransom of the prisoners some fruit, a book, or a print. I have frequently heard the Emperor describe his amusements at Brienne.

I recollect in particular, one day, when Madame de Brienne paid a visit to Madame Mère, accompanied by her niece, Madame de Loménie. The Emperor, who was present, conversed with her for a considerable time with almost filial affection. The respect he showed to Madame de Brienne was unmingled with any trace of affectation; his behavior to her was perfectly easy and natural. I am certain that Napoleon must have suffered cruelly on the day of the Battle of Brienne. I am sure of it, from the complacency with which I have so often heard him dwell on the happiness he enjoyed at college. It was there that he first became acquainted with Bourrienne.

The Battle of Brienne was followed by several others. In the midst of these conflicts, when cannons were roaring and blood flowing in every part of France, from the banks of the Rhine to those of the Mincio, a Congress was opened, as if in derision of the impotence of human will. This Congress held its sittings at Châtillon, in the heart of one of our provinces. Its members were Count Stadion, for Austria; Baron Humboldt, for Prussia; Count Razumowsky, for Russia; while Lord Aberdeen, Lord Cathcart, and Lord Castlereagh, the English Minister for Foreign Affairs, represented the interests of Great Britain.

This latter circumstance might have enabled Napoleon to see that his fate was decreed. England being represented by three members at the Congress sufficiently indicated the degree of influence she was about to claim over the destiny of Napoleon; while at the same time, the other Powers showed their submission to England by each sending only one Plenipotentiary. As to France, she sent only one individual to the Congress at Châtillon, and that was General Caulaincourt, the Duke of Vicenza.*

*The Emperor, who highly and justly esteemed the Duke of Bassano had withdrawn him from the post of Minister for Foreign Affairs,

He was then, nobody knows why, Minister for Foreign Affairs. I know very well the private motive which induced the Emperor to send him to Châtillon; but one thing which I cannot comprehend is, how Napoleon should imagine that that reason could have any weight in the scale of general interests.

The reason to which I allude is the cordial friendship with which the Emperor Alexander honored the Duke of Vicenza. It was one of those friendships, almost fraternal, which are so rare in the world, and, above all, rare among Sovereigns. But in the circumstances in which Alexander stood, being called to the head of the gigantic coalition of Europe, he appeared in the face of the whole world as the opponent of Napoleon, and therefore the latter was wrong in flattering himself that any private interest could have weight with him in opposition to the general interests. Sovereigns have two natures. Napoleon well knew this.

While the Congress was sitting the Allied armies were advancing on Paris and inclosing us within their ranks. The Emperor fought and gained several battles, and seemed to surpass himself in energy and talent. But what availed this? France was overrun with enemies, who were marching in all directions upon the capital.

The victory of Champaubert revived a faint ray of hope. AlsuviEFF, the Russian General, was taken, with a corps of 6,000 men and 45 officers. This was succeeded by the Battle of Montmirail. General Sacken, with a part of the Army of Silesia, commanded by Blucher, was attacked and beaten by the Emperor. Twenty-five pieces of artillery, 3,000 killed, 2,000 wounded, and 1,000 prisoners, were the result of this battle, which, as well as the engagement of the preceding day, proved the inferiority of Blucher, and, indeed, of all who were opposed to the Emperor.

Two days before the battles of Montmirail and Champaubert, the Duke of Bassano, who had been daily urging the Emperor to send more extended powers to the Duke of Vicenza, had at length prevailed on Napoleon to draw merely to satisfy petty passions, which he had not time to contend with. He gave the Duke of Bassano full powers to correspond with Châtillon. But to have done any good it would have been requisite for him to have been on the spot.

up the instructions and to sign them, in order that they might be forwarded to Châtillon. On the eve of the Battle of Champaubert, the Duke said to the Emperor: "Sire, the powers are ready." "I will sign them tomorrow," replied Napoleon. "If I should be killed they will not be wanted; if I should conquer we shall then be able to treat with better advantage."

Next day the Duke of Bassano, who, it is well known, was with the Emperor in all his battles, went to him after the victory, and presented to him the powers which he had promised to sign. The Emperor made the same reply as that which he had given on the preceding day. The Duke of Bassano withdrew much disappointed. On the evening of the Battle of Montmirail he again urged the Emperor to sign the powers. But some strange visions had entered the Emperor's brain. He smiled, and, looking at the maps of France and Europe which lay before him: "I now stand in such a situation that I need not yield an inch of ground," said he to the Duke, "and I will sign nothing."

The campaign in France is a sublime effort of Napoleon's genius, and places him in the rank of the most celebrated captains, if not at their head. But what result did he anticipate? What conclusion could be expected from partial victories like those of Montmirail and Champaubert, while innumerable legions covered our plains on the North and South. The Congress of Châtillon, it is true, held out some hope, but, as I have before observed, the presence of three envoys from England might have opened the eyes of the Emperor, even though he had been blinded by the blaze of his ancient glory. The following anecdote, the correctness of which I can vouch for, I had from the party concerned:

When the Comte d'Artois arrived at Vesoul he was accompanied by several persons attached to the Bourbon cause, while a crowd of persons, who came to meet him, were awaiting his arrival to pay homage to him such as never was rendered to Napoleon. The Prince had met with an old Swiss officer, named Wildermetz. This person was dispatched to the Russian Headquarters to request that the Emperor Alexander would authorize the Comte d'Artois, and I believe the Duc de Berry, to proceed to the Headquarters of the Allied Sovereigns, and enter themselves as volunteers during the campaign of RECONQUERING France. M. de Wildermetz was charged with a similar message to Count Stadion for the Emperor of Austria. He likewise had a letter accrediting him to Prince Metternich.

On his arrival at the Russian Headquarters he saw the Emperor Alexander, who addressed him thus: "M. de Wildermetz, you will tell the Comte d'Artois that I am extremely sorry to be obliged to refuse his request, but we are just now engaged in conferences of a serious and important nature. They may terminate in MAINTAINING THE EMPEROR NAPOLEON ON THE THRONE OF FRANCE. Under these circumstances their Royal Highnesses would be placed here in an awkward position, and, in every respect, it is better that they should remain some time longer on the frontier." M. de Wildermetz returned to Franche-Comté to report this answer, but the Princes had left the place before he arrived.

Napoleon hoped to draw the whole of the hostile army after him, when he fell back upon Saint Dizier. This was a bold resolution, and one the generosity of which the Parisians ought to have felt. But he was pursued by only a corps of ten thousand men, and the entire mass of the Allied Force fell upon Paris with all the fury of a tempest. The Emperor of Russia waited only to direct the attack on La Fère-Champenoise, and then proceeded to Paris, as if he had been making a journey from Moscow to St. Petersburg. The enemy was at the gates of Paris, and yet no measures had been taken for the defense of the Capital.

The Russians had the courage to burn their palaces, why did we not fire our faubourgs for their reception? We had not even arms wherewith to equip our men. Ammunition, too, was wanting. Was this from want of foresight, or was it the result of treason? Alas! it is too true that we had among us at that period many who were unworthy of the name of Frenchmen.

The Cossacks committed atrocious horrors in the department of the Aisne. They then marched upon Sens. Dijon was laid under a contribution of two millions. Saumur was subjected to their insults, not only in the persons of its inhabitants but in those of its municipal body, and Montbard, which now contained the grave of one who would have valiantly defended it—that of Junot—Montbard, which was likewise the cradle of a man whose fame belonged to all Europe, was delivered up to the pillage of the Allied troops.

Montbard was the favorite retreat of Buffon; he had fitted up a house there with exquisite taste. The gardens were superb, and the greenhouses and plantations were objects of curiosity to travelers. All was now laid waste. My father-in-law's house was visited with a similar fate by the exterminating hand of the invaders. The unfortunate old man was unable to bear up against this new calamity, following so closely on the death of his much-beloved son. He died a few weeks after the invasion, without ever recovering his speech, which he lost by a paralytic attack occasioned by the sight of the Russian and German uniforms.

Our fertile provinces were now inundated with battalions of barbarians, and every day their destroying lines drew closer. The Government, acting on its secret principles, prohibited the journals from publishing the truth. Whether this measure was wise or unwise I do not pretend to determine. But this, however, I can say, that the intelligence most cautiously concealed was generally well known; and that, perhaps, it would at this time have been better policy to have allowed a perfectly free expression of opinion.

Throughout the whole of this crisis the Emperor's conduct was certainly admirable; but yet all he did led to no effective result. The Battle of Montereau was doubtless one of the most brilliant conceptions of his genius, and one of the most remarkable examples of the valor of our troops and the skill of our generals. But what we then wanted was peace—with peace all might have been saved.

An opéra de circonstance, entitled the "Oriflamme," was brought out in Paris at the very time when the Comte d'Artois was at Vesoul. At such a time the title might well have appeared ominous, but a sort of general vertigo seemed to prevail. I well remember the first performance of the "Oriflamme." It was like a national convention of the beau monde. Every box was filled. The Faubourg Saint Germain saw with enthusiasm the title of the "Oriflamme," and prepared to bestow on the piece the most extravagant applause. I was then in the habit of seeing many of the residents of the royal Faubourg, and their joy knew no bounds.

The success of the "Oriflamme" was extraordinary. The authors certainly could not be accused of Royalist opinions. I can answer for one of them at least, that is M. Étienne. The other was M. Baour Lormian.

Joseph Bonaparte had settled upon Bernardin de Saint-Pierre a pension of 6,000 francs, which, together with some other property he possessed, afforded him sufficient means of subsistence.

It was extremely interesting to hear Bernardin de Saint-Pierre converse about Jean Jacques Rousseau. He had been his pupil, and he was much attached to his master. I one day advised him to write his conversations with J. J. Rousseau, and to publish them.

"No," said he, "I cannot prevail on myself to do that."

"Why?" inquired I.

"Because I should feel as though I were putting my friend's noble thoughts up to sale; and I could not tolerate that idea."

He told me that one day he and Rousseau went to dine together in the country—I think to Belleville or Menilmontant. Rousseau was profoundly melancholy that day. He was suffering from that nervous state of feeling which rendered him unhappy beyond the power of consolation, and made him see misery where he might often have found happiness. Bernardin respected those moments when Rousseau's mind seemed to retire within itself. He walked silently beside his friend, speaking only in reply to the observations made to him, leaving him undisturbed to his reveries, for he knew by experience that solitude and silence are the best friends of grief. As they walked in this manner, side by side, Rousseau sometimes stooped to gather a flower, which he placed in his herbal that he might afterward compare it with a corresponding one in the Flora of Linnæus. He had with him a book, in which he noted down his observations. At that moment the bell of a distant convent announced the hour of vespers. Rousseau started, then, throwing himself on his knees, he ejaculated a fervent prayer, and in joining his hands he let fall some flowers which he had just gathered. His prayer being ended, he rose, and the two friends continued their promenade. After a few moments' silence, Rousseau said to Bernardin de Saint-Pierre:

"I have often felt inclined in moments like this, to become a Catholic. Do you know why? That I might turn monk."

His friend looked at him with astonishment.

"Yes," pursued Rousseau, "I firmly believe that a solitude like a monastery, peopled by men serving God, must be a foretaste of heaven."

Bernardin shook his head with an air of doubt, and said:

"Then why not enter our communion? You will found a PARACLETE, in which you soon will have more disciples than Abélard."

"The reason why I do not put that design into execution," said Rousseau, with a melancholy smile, "is because if I were to quit the world I must relinquish love; and how is it possible to live without love?"

When Cardinal Maury announced to me the death of Bernadin de Saint-Pierre, the reader may readily imagine, from all that I have related of my former acquaintance with this celebrated man, that I was much shocked at the intelligence.

"It is curious," said I to Cardinal Maury, "that within a very short time you have been the first to acquaint me with the deaths of two very celebrated men—viz, the Abbé Delille and Bernardin de Saint-Pierre."

"True," said the Cardinal, pausing and looking thoughtful. Then, taking my hand, he said:

"I wonder who will be the first person to tell you of my death! Let us see. It will be Millin! no—Cherval! no—Talleyrand! Yes, it will be Talleyrand!"

"Nonsense!" said I. "Judging from your looks, your Excellency bids fair to outlive me."

He shook his head sorrowfully. He was depressed in spirits, for he foresaw the dénouement of the drama that was passing before us. He had a presentiment that the Empire would not long survive and he told me so with painful emotion, for he was much attached to the Emperor.

"Well," said he again, "I should like to guess who will tell you of my death!"

It was a postilion of Viterbo.

THE Austrians were now before Grenoble, maintaining a heavy cannonade. Affairs every day assumed a more somber aspect. The invaders were advancing upon us with such terrible speed and regularity that nothing seemed likely to check their progress. The Germans were penetrating into Dauphiné; the English and Spaniards were advancing by the Pyrenees. Hitherto our attention had been exclusively directed toward the North, but now the torrent was gaining upon us on all sides.

One of the singularities of that period was the gay aspect of Paris during the winter of 1814. Masked balls and private balls were given without intermission, and yet the disastrous intelligence that was daily received put dozens of families into mourning. Meanwhile the Emperor acquired some partial advantages over the Allied armies. But what did they avail? Only to show the more convincingly that all was lost. Treason, too, had made rapid progress. In many towns the White Flag was concealed in some of the houses in anticipation of the favorable moment for raising the cry of Vive le Roi. How was it that the Duke of Rovigo, who was sincerely attached to the Emperor, did not make himself acquainted with the real state of France at that time? The truth is that the Duke was a most incompetent Minister of the Police. Toulouse, Bordeaux, and a great part of the South, where trade had suffered greatly by the War, ardently prayed for peace apart from any wish for the return of the Bourbons.

Will it be believed that Napoleon's evil star now so completely ruled his destiny that he allowed himself to be misled by false reports of the march of the enemy's forces, which reports, however, caused the loss of Paris? After the affair of Saint Dizier, the Emperor's object was to make a diversion, to draw together all the enemy's forces, and to give a decisive battle, which should deliver Paris.

Information, which was subsequently ascertained to be false, induced Napoleon to march to meet the corps of Winzingerode with a force amounting only to ten thousand men, all cavalry. In his rear there was no infantry; in short, no army. The marches and countermarches requisite for this operation caused Napoleon to lose four days. This loss was irreparable.

Now that I have arrived at the period when we bade adieu to our days of glory, I must mention an occurrence which I think sufficiently important to claim a place in these "Memoirs;" I allude to the presentation to the city of Paris of the last colors taken by the Emperor from the enemy. It was a most imposing ceremony, and the recollection of it must still be vivid in the minds of many of my own age. I shall never forget what I felt on that occasion.

It was on a Sunday; the weather was superb for that season of the year, for it was then the end of February. An immense concourse of people thronged the quays of the Louvre, the Place du Carrousel, and the Rue de Rivoli. The Minister at War (Clarke), who already in his heart had pronounced against the colors which he bore in triumph, took a conspicuous part in the ceremony. The cortège passed along the Quay, the Place du Carrousel, and the Pont Royal, in admirable order. First came General Hulin and all his Staff, preceded by a numerous military band; then followed the Staff of the Gendarmery of Paris, the National Guard, and finally the ten flags, two of which were borne by officers of the Imperial Guard. I could not help remarking the expression which was imprinted on the countenances of these two men. It partook at once of the pride of triumph and the dejection which necessarily followed the reflection: THESE FLAGS WERE TAKEN FROM THE ENEMY ONLY TWENTY LEAGUES FROM PARIS! The other eight flags were borne by four officers of the Line and four officers of the National Guard.

Next came the Minister at War in his carriage, followed and preceded by his aids-de-camp, likewise in carriages, which, by the way, I may observe, had rather a ludicrous effect. The procession was closed by the Imperial Guard and troops of the Line. It entered the Court of the Tuileries by the triumphal arch of the Carrousel, and the Minister at War, having halted under the Vestibule de l'Horloge, received there the trophies which he was afterward to present to the Empress.

King Joseph, whom the Emperor had left in Paris as his Lieutenant-General, that day reviewed the National Guards. The Place du Carrousel and the Court of the Tuileries were filled with troops. I saw King Joseph at a distance, riding along the ranks of the National Guard and troops of the Line. His striking resemblance to the Emperor might have made me fancy myself transported back to the glorious days of the Consulate and the Empire.

When the flags were carried through the Court of the Tuileries, the drums beat and the National Guard presented arms; that movement was electrifying, and a general shout of "Vive l'Empereur!" was once more re-echoed by the walls of the Tuileries. The Minister at War first proceeded to the Hall of the Council of State, where he was received by a Master of the Ceremonies. He was afterward conducted to the Salon de la Paix, where the Comte de Ségur, as Grand Master of Ceremonies, awaited him. The Comte de Ségur introduced him to the Salle du Trône, where the Empress, surrounded by her Ladies and Gentlemen in waiting, the Princes, Grand Dignitaries, Ministers, and Grand Officers of the Empire, received the flags presented to her by the Minister at War (the Duc de Feltre). A formal speech was delivered by the Duke, to which the Empress replied very briefly.

After this solemn ceremony the flags were conveyed to the Invalides and consigned to the care of that same Marshal Serrurier to whom Napoleon gave such a good-natured reproof, when, a year afterward, he found the Hôtel des Invalides deserted by his old brothers-in-arms who had fought with him in Egypt and Italy. Of the ten flags, one was Austrian, four were Prussian, and five Russian. They were brought to Paris by Baron Mortemart, one of the Emperor's orderly officers.

One evening Cardinal Maury came to visit me. When he entered I observed that he looked particularly dull. I had two or three friends with me, and he asked me to favor him with a few minutes' conversation in my cabinet. As soon as we entered he closed the door, threw himself on a sofa, and, folding his arms with an air of despondency, he said: "All is lost! Heaven alone can save us by a miracle! We must now invoke that miracle, for I have ordered prayers of forty hours." I shuddered! Prayers of forty hours! It seemed like the preparation for death. It was the precursor of the death of our country.

"Heavens!" I exclaimed, "surely we may hope that the genius of the Emperor——" The Cardinal shook his head mournfully. "He is dragging us into the abyss into which he has plunged himself! His obstinacy banishes all hope. Oh that we lived in the days in which ecclesiastics bore the halberd and the sword! Old as I am, I would mount my horse. I would go to the Emperor and say, 'Sire, if those who are about you have not courage to let you hear the truth, I will tell you that you are hurling yourself and France to destruction. I have come to lend my feeble aid in her defense.'"

"No, Cardinal," said I, "do not regret your mission of peace and conciliation. Remain with us, and pray for the success of our arms."

The most disastrous news had succeeded the delusive hope which for a moment cheered us. In the space of five days the Emperor had beaten all the corps of the Army of Silesia, and driven them between the Aisne and the Marne. The five corps of the Army of Silesia lost more than twenty thousand men in the space of five days. The genius of the Army of Italy once more favored Napoleon; yet her smiles were but transient. The Emperor's able and rapidly-conceived plans were all defeated by whom? By Blucher, the fugitive of Jena, the prisoner of Lübeck!

In the meanwhile the party of the old noblesse was gaining strength. The Cardinal told me many remarkable particulars on this subject. "The Emperor," said he, "does not attach sufficient importance to old recollections. Even the defects of the régime of the Bourbons, when contrasted with those of his, were converted into blessings. The pusillanimity of Louis XVI. and all the abuses of his reign vanished, in comparison with the absolutism of Napoleon." "Do you, then, think it possible," said I, "that the Bourbons will ever return to France?" At first he made no reply. This subject did not please him. The Bourbons would certainly not receive him on their arrival in France.

"Yes," said the Cardinal, after a pause, "they will return; and the Emigrants who have been continually blundering, will, for once, probably see their way rightly, and will manœuvre by instinct, if not by talent. If this result do not arrive, it must be owing to a renewal of the same faults which they committed at Coblenz at the time of the Emigration. The Emperor has loaded them with favors. He will see their gratitude."

The Cardinal was right. The greatest fault Napoleon ever committed was to surround himself with men who, while they kissed his hand, were plotting treason against him. He who so often followed the maxims of Machiavelli ought to have borne in mind the following precept: "Never restore to men the half of what they have lost, for they will use it against you."

Bordeaux soon opened its gates to the Duc d'Angoulême. The Prince was preceded by an Anglo-Spanish advanced guard.

I received from Châtillon, where I had many friends, intelligence of the rupture of the negotiations. Napoleon, after long insisting on the bases of the treaty proposed at Frankfort, presented, through the medium of the Duke of Vicenza, a counter-project, declaring that he, Napoleon, would consent to remain Sovereign of France circumscribed within its old limits, with only the additions of Savoy, Nice, and the Isle of Elba.* The Allies rejected all these propositions, and faithfully adhered to the declarations of the treaty, offensive and defensive, signed at Chaumont on the 1st of March—the situation of Napoleon had changed since the Treaty of Frankfort!

The definitive reply was given on the 19th of March. Napoleon resolved that, if he fell, his fall should be without a parallel. On the 20th and 21st of March he fought the Battles of Arcis-sur-Aube. On these two days he exposed himself to danger like a common soldier, giving proofs of the rarest courage and presence of mind at a time when he must have been a prey to the most harassing anxiety. The enemy's artillery kept up a terrible fire! The balls bounded through the air without intermission.

* He also wished to retain a portion of Italy for Prince Eugène, the Grand-Duchy of Berg, and the Principality of Neuchâtel. The latter was for Berthier. A clause for Berthier!

In the very heat of the engagement there came up a corps of that sacred phalanx, composed of men whose courage had been tried in a hundred battles—I mean the Old Guard. At the moment when the corps arrived on the field, the Emperor saw that the danger was imminent. He formed the troops into squares. The enemy's fire redoubled, and a bomb fell close to the foremost rank of one of the squares. In spite of the long-tried courage of the veterans, this occurrence caused a movement in the ranks. Napoleon immediately saw how important was the result of that moment.

He spurred his horse and galloped up close to the bombshell, and, turning to the troops, said with a smile, "Well, what is the matter? surely you are not frightened at this?" In another instant the shell burst; and not only did Napoleon and his horse escape unhurt, but it happened that no injury was sustained by anyone. This was the way in which Napoleon led his troops to victory!

Ferdinand VII. had now returned to his kingdom. On his arrival at La Flania, near Figuières, he was delivered up by Marshal Suchet, in the presence of the two combined armies. Thus did the long Peninsular War terminate just at the point at which it began, and, to complete the mortification, Spain, whose soil had been drenched with the blood of so many martyrs of liberty, was a few months afterward again made subject to the stupid and tyrannical yoke of divine right.

I have now arrived at the crises of our misfortunes. The Emperor was forsaken by all his Allies. Murat had totally abandoned him. He occupied Tuscany, and had become, as it were, the ally of Ferdinand IV., his enemy, the man who regarded him as a usurper. Both now marched together against the French. I have already mentioned that the Emperor Napoleon was misled by a false report, either through treachery or accident. This error was fatal to Paris, which was abandoned with no other defenders than Clarke, the War Minister, and King Joseph—the latter abandoned us. Though I entertain a profound respect for General Clarke, I must confess that I do not think he was equal to the important trust reposed in him.

But the mainspring which set the machinery in motion was M. de Talleyrand, whom the Emperor would have done well to have lodged in Vincennes. It was not the unassisted efforts of the Faubourg Saint Germain that brought about the Restoration: it is a great error to suppose so. No doubt the Royalists had in Paris very active coteries of intriguing priests and women; but these obscure arsenals merely prepared the arms which were directed against the Emperor. M. de Talleyrand was not the sole author of the Restoration; he merely fixed the cockades which were already prepared. To this he will owe all his celebrity, and not to a political career which is not signalized by any incident important to his country.

In spite of the Hosanna at that time chanted by a chorus of old women in honor of the genius of M. de Talleyrand, it might fairly be asked what he had ever done either FOR or AGAINST France. He was a man of wit, and his bonmots were excellent. But wit was his only qualification. It was a finely-painted curtain, behind which there was absolutely NOTHING till the 30th of March. On the 30th of March, M. de Talleyrand distinguished himself by doing something important AGAINST France. I will briefly trace his course during that memorable period.

The danger became daily more and more pressing. The Emperor momentarily received intelligence of new defections. The conscripts were refractory and discontented; treason multiplied in the departments, and rendered more frightful the disasters caused by the presence of the Allied troops. There was no recruiting; contributions could no longer be levied, and money was scarce. Our most fertile provinces were desolated by the requisitions of the enemy.

This disastrous state of things was aggravated by Napoleon himself, by his fatal distrust of the population of Paris. He was afraid to arm that population too long before the hour of danger really arrived, and then perfidy in the hour of need had neutralized our means of defense. He was deceived, as I have said, at Saint Dizier by Winzingerode's corps of cavalry, which he took for the enemy's advanced guard; and having repulsed it, he discovered that the main army was not in its rear. What an error! He now found that he had been betrayed. He saw before him his own ruin, and that of France. He determined on a retrograde movement behind the Forest of Fontainebleau.

The inhabitants of Paris were in a state of the most painful anxiety. What was to be their fate? We concealed all that we could conceal of our valuables, and prepared for flight; but in which direction were we to go? The English were advancing by the way of Guienne; the Austrians by the Lyonnais, the Bourbonnais, and Burgundy. Champagne was the theater of war, as well as the provinces toward Flanders. On all sides there were disasters and ruin, towns and villages burned, and the earth deluged with blood.

On the 28th of March a Council of Regency was held, and it was resolved that the Empress and the King of Rome should quit Paris. Who could have advised a measure so impolitic, and so little productive of advantage to the Empress herself? Was it expected that the English would show her more respect than the Austrians if she had encountered them? Maria Louisa was our shield, and we would have been her defense.

The departure of the Empress and the King of Rome is still involved in mystery. They proceeded to Blois, accompanied by an escort of two thousand six hundred picked troops, leaving Paris to be defended by King Joseph and the National Guard without arms. Doubtless Napoleon ordered their departure, but he must have been deceived. Maria Louisa was followed by all the Ministers and all the Great Dignitaries, except M. de Talleyrand, Savary, and Clarke, who were not to depart until the 30th.

The approaches to Paris were defended by Marshals Marmont and Mortier, the former having with him only two thousand four hundred seasoned infantry and eight hundred cavalry. Marmont defended the heights of Belleville and Romainville. The Duke of Treviso had to defend the intervening space from the canal to the Seine, and Marmont from the canal to the Marne. On the day of the attack, the 30th of March, universal terror prevailed. The interior of every house was the abode of mourning and despair. Paris seemed like a city struck by the malediction of Heaven. The Duke of Rovigo had received instructions not to quit the capital before the Prince of Benevento.

This was strange, and it may serve as an answer to those who allege that the Emperor never respected social liberty where his interests were concerned. M. de Talleyrand was free to depart; it was only the Emperor's Minister who was detained captive, for his departure depended on that of the Prince of Benevento. But to quit Paris at that particular moment would not have suited the Prince's purpose. It was necessary to invent an excuse, and the following was thought of. I know not why the Duke of Rovigo has not related the circumstance as it really happened. Perhaps he wished to disguise, under the veil of silence, the sort of mystification that was played upon him.

Prince Talleyrand still remained in Paris, for his absence was not wished by the party who had been busily preparing white flags and cockades. That party wished to get rid of the Duke of Rovigo. He was devoted to the Emperor. I must render him this justice, if I have been severe to him on other points. What was wanted was to get him to depart, and to allow the Prince of Benevento to stay.

This object was effected by the clever management of Madame de Remusat. That lady repaired to the Prefecture of the Police. She was on terms of intimate friendship with M. Étienne Pasquier, then Prefect. "My dear Baron," said she, as she entered his cabinet, "I have come to request that you will do me a service." "What is it?" "M. de Talleyrand must not quit Paris."

Accustomed as M. Pasquier was to extraordinary revolutions of opinions and parties, he could not repress a very significant expression of surprise while he listened to Madame de Remusat. It was some time before he made any reply. At length he said: "What can I do, madame? M. de Talleyrand must quit Paris like all the rest of the Great Dignitaries. You would not have me disobey the Emperor's order; for he is still Emperor, and may be back again to-morrow." Madame de Remusat shrugged her shoulders with an air of contempt: "Come, come, Baron, surely you are not one of those who think he has power to work miracles! He has no longer any army, no Empire."

Baron Pasquier shook his head. "But that is nothing to the purpose," said he; "you propose a thing that cannot be done. It is perfectly impossible to do what you wish. Where is M. de Talleyrand?" "At your door, in my carriage." "Is not your husband at the Barrière du Maine with his company?" "He is." "Well, I should imagine that he is the best person to detain M. de Talleyrand in Paris. Let him set out in his own carriage, with his own liveries, so as to let it be seen that he does set out. On his arrival at the Barrière, your husband may detain him if he pleases. I have no need to appear in the business. This is my advice; and if you think fit you may follow it."

Madame de Remusat left the cabinet of the Prefect perfectly satisfied. As soon as the Duke of Rovigo was informed, by his spies, that the Prince of Benevento had left his Hôtel, he left his, and quitted Paris without seeking any further information, and without knowing whether the enemy was not practicing some artful scheme. I beg his pardon for speaking of him thus candidly; but his conduct was worse than MALADROIT—it was stupid.

When M. de Talleyrand learned that the Duke of Rovigo had thus left the field open to him, he said nothing, but he smiled with that satirical expression so customary with him. He returned to Paris, and his conduct there is so well known that I need scarcely describe it. He, without any reserve, placed himself in hostility to the falling party, and joined the party that was triumphing. There certainly is, in M. de Talleyrand's nature, some quality which attracts him toward those who are gaining power, and repels him from those who are losing that same power. We saw proofs of this on the 18th Brumaire, in 1814, and in 1830.

Thus it was that M. de Talleyrand remained in Paris after all the members of the Government had joined the Empress at Blois. The poor Duke of Rovigo was so ill served by his spies that they gave him false reports, and the account of the above affair, as given in his "Memoirs," is wholly incorrect. The story is as I have related it. Several of the actors who took part in the drama are still living. My account may possibly displease them; but they can only deny my statements, they cannot prove them to be untrue.

While all these incidents were passing, the inhabitants of Paris were in a dreadful state of alarm. I had concealed most of my diamonds in a girdle which I wore over my corset. My pearls, and some other jewels of minor value, were concealed in a similar manner by Mademoiselle Poidevin, the governess of my daughters. Toward evening my drawing-room began to fill.

Madame Juste de Noailles was among my visitors. She was very uneasy at the aspect of affairs, though not alarmed for the safety of herself and her family. In the event of a return of the Bourbons the Noailles were sure of standing on a favorable footing. But her husband was at the Headquarters of the Emperor Alexander, and she was anxious to see what turn affairs would take.

At length eleven o'clock struck. The fatal morning was approaching, and I had as yet formed no settled determination. I sat down and wrote to the Duke of Ragusa. The friendship which had united him to the Duke of Abrantès induced me to appeal to him for advice, and I felt assured that he would direct me to the most prudent course. I therefore wrote to him that, being ALONE in my house with my four young children, I was greatly perplexed, and did not know whether it would be most advisable to depart or to remain where I was.

I sent my letter to the Hôtel de Raguse, where the Marshal happened to be at that very moment engaged in drawing up the capitulation, or rather in receiving the conditions. Occupied as he must have been, he seized his first moment of leisure to answer me. The following is a copy of his letter:

"I thank you, madame, for the proof of confidence you have given me. Since you ask for my advice, I would recommend you not to quit Paris, which to-morrow will certainly be more tranquil than any place within twenty leagues round. After having done all in my power for the honor of France and the French arms, I am forced to sign a capitulation which will permit foreign troops to enter our capital to-morrow! All my efforts have been unavailing. I have been compelled to yield to numbers, whatever regret I may have felt in doing so. But it was my duty to spare the blood of the soldiers confided to my charge. I could not do otherwise than I have done; and I hope that my country will judge me as I deserve. My conscience expects this justice."

I received this letter at two o'clock in the morning. I read it to the friends who had assembled at my house. It, of course, decided us not to leave Paris; but at the same time it profoundly grieved us. A capitulation!—and before the very Barriers of Paris!

It is false that Napoleon sent M. de Girardin to Paris, with orders that the powder magazines of Grenelle should be blown up before the arrival of the Allies. The Emperor, on the contrary, was destitute of ammunition, and desired that the powder should be conveyed, if possible, to Fontainebleau. He loved his Parisians better than to sacrifice them wantonly, without any prospect of ulterior good.

CHAPTER XXXII.

The Allies Enter Paris—First Appearance of the White Cockade—The Allied Troops and Their White Scarfs—The Emperor Alexander at the Hôtel of M. de Talleyrand—The Council—Napoleon at Fontainebleau—A Conspiracy—Berthier Deserts the Emperor—The Duke of Ragusa and General Souham—Deputation of the Marshals—The Emperor of Russia—His Answer to the Marshals—Napoleon's Conversation on Suicide—He Takes Poison—His Recovery.

THE Allies had now actually entered Paris. The Duke of Ragusa had retired to Essonne, together with Generals Souham, Compans, and several others.

At two o'clock on the morning of the 31st of March, that day so important in the history of France, the capitulation of Paris was signed. The Bourbons would consequently have been proclaimed at daybreak by their party, had the assent of the Allied Powers been positive and unreserved; but even at eleven o'clock in the forenoon nothing betokened the intended restoration. It was not until twelve o'clock that some white cockades and flags became visible in the Place Louis XV. These demonstrations of royalty were paraded along the Place by about forty persons on horseback, who waved the flags and shouted "Vive le Roi! Vivent les Bourbons!" But the people were mournful and silent, and did not join in these cries. This is an unquestionable fact.

The Archbishop of Malines himself declared that however desirous he was to see the fall of Bonaparte, he neither heard nor saw anything on the 31st of March that could lead him to expect the return of the old Dynasty. The Duke Dalberg, who was at a window in the Hôtel of M. de Talleyrand, exclaimed: "They are mounting the white cockade!" Then some of the party assembled at M. de Talleyrand's went out merely to see, as one of them expressed it, what had caused the uproar. Ten men on horseback, with white flags, proceeded in the direction of the Boulevard de la Madeleine. As they passed through the Rue Royale the shouts became louder. Windows were opened, white cockades were thrown out, and ladies waved white handkerchiefs.

The group of persons described above were on the Boulevard de la Madeleine when they met M. Tourton, a General Officer of the National Guard. He was on horseback, and was accompanied by an aid-de-camp of the Emperor of Russia. Both were stopped by the group, who continued to shout "Vive le Roi! Vivent les Bourbons!"

M. Tourton said he could not grant them the protection they required until he had orders from the Government; and the Emperor of Russia's aid-de-camp seemed very much embarrassed. These two gentlemen proceeded to the Barrière de Belleville, leaving the group on the Boulevard. The fact is that all this movement was only partial, and that if a squadron of the Imperial Guard had galloped through Paris the little party of Bourbonites would speedily have been dispersed.

On the 31st of March the Allied Sovereigns entered Paris. As they advanced into the capital the demonstrations in favor of the Bourbons became more positive, either because the fear of Napoleon had hitherto repressed the real sentiments of the populace, or because that populace merely followed the inclination natural to mankind, to salute the rising and to turn from the setting sun.

A circumstance, trivial in itself, had a singular influence at this crisis; it was observed that the Allied troops had all white scarfs tied round their arms: they were worn as the sign of victory, and not as the badge of French Royalism. Most people, however, regarded them in the latter point of view, and the Royalists, artfully profiting by the mistake, reported that Louis XVIII. was acknowledged by the Emperor of Russia, and even by the Emperor of Austria, that Prince Schwartzenberg wore the white scarf, and that the King's arrival might be looked for next day.

It is a positive fact that no pledge for the Restoration had been given by the Allies. No doubt the Emperor Alexander might cherish a feeling more or less favorable to the Bourbons; but as yet that feeling had not been manifested. The Emperor of Russia arrived at M. de Talleyrand's on foot, having alighted from his horse after seeing the troops defile. He was received by M. de Talleyrand, having as aides des cérémonies M. de Pradt on the one hand and the Abbé Louis on the other. Both were eagerly craving for the good things of office, and they humbly bowed before the conqueror in the hope of sharing the spoil of the conquered. M. de Talleyrand did not reflect that these two gentlemen were of his own cloth; if he had, he would probably have shaken off the Archbishop of Malines at least.

I ought, however, to mention that, previously to the arrival of the Emperor of Russia, M. de Nesselrode had been closeted for two hours with M. de Talleyrand; and there is reason to believe that in that tête-à-tête were DETERMINED the matters which were subsequently DISCUSSED in the Council: whether this was with the cognizance of the Emperor of Russia I know not.

On his way to the house of M. de Talleyrand the Emperor Alexander was accosted by Vicomte Sosthènes de La Rochefoucauld who earnestly implored him to restore to France her legitimate Sovereign. This step on the part of M. de La Rochefoucauld was as honorable as the conduct of the persons to whom I have just alluded was base. M. de La Rochefoucauld never served Napoleon in any way, whether in the army or the Imperial Household. His sentiments were always consistent.

When he mounted the white cockade he merely manifested a feeling which had long been cherished by himself and his family. The reply of Alexander to the petition of M. de La Rochefoucauld was singularly circumspect. He held out to him no hope; and, indeed, his reply might without difficulty have been construed into a refusal.

This indecision arose out of a cause which was not, at the time generally understood in Paris. The Emperor of Russia was not convinced that the whole nation shared the enthusiasm of a few hundred individuals whom M. de Talleyrand presented to him as the KINGDOM. At the recent engagement at Fère-Champenoise, the Russians had seen a few thousand men allow themselves to be cut to pieces rather than yield to the enemy; and these men had been taken from the plow only a few days before. What, then, was to be expected from the army—the marshals and the generals?

This question occupied the attention of the Emperor Alexander—I know this from a source of unquestionable authority. Thus far M. de Talleyrand may be said to have aided the Restoration, for between him and M. de Nesselrode the plans were previously arranged. The Emperor Alexander was induced to adopt them, and one strong argument employed to effect this object was the defection of Marmont. Marmont! the brother-in-arms, the aid-de-camp, the dearest bosom friend of Napoleon, since the death of Junot, Lannes, Duroc, Bessières; yes, even he had abandoned him! It was evident, then, that France wished to depose him. Another fatal circumstance was Napoleon's separation from Maria Louisa.*

Nevertheless the Emperor of Russia firmly resisted the suggested restoration on the grounds proposed by M. de Talleyrand. "What means would you employ?" inquired the Emperor Alexander. "The constituted authorities," confidently replied M. de Talleyrand. The Emperor appeared astonished. "What authorities? they are all dispersed." "I ask your Majesty's pardon. The members of the Senate are in sufficient number. (This was not true.) So are those of the Legislative Body.

*The Empress and her son were still at Blois.

The Senate having once pronounced, France will obey its dictates."* Alexander still hesitated.

"Will your Majesty be pleased to hear two witnesses in confirmation of my testimony?" With these words M. de Talleyrand sent for the Baron Louis and the Archbishop of Malines. On the evidence of these two men the Emperor of Russia formed his opinion on the state of France! In truth, I am almost inclined to believe that his mind was made up beforehand.

The Council was held immediately afterward. It consisted of the Emperor Alexander and the King of Prussia, the Duke Dalberg, M. Nesselrode, M. Pozzo di Borgo, Prince Schwartzberg, Prince Lichtenstein, M. de Talleyrand, Baron Louis, and the Archbishop of Malines. These individuals were ranged on the right and left of the large table which stood in the middle of the apartment.

The Emperor Alexander did not sit down, but alternately stood and walked about; his mind seemed quite absorbed in the great interests which were under consideration. He expatiated largely on the misfortunes of war, and ended by observing that Napoleon, having merited to be deprived of a power which he had abused, France should be allowed to choose another Sovereign, and that the Allies should aid that important object by assisting to repress the efforts of persons striving to maintain an order of things which it was necessary totally to abolish.

Having said this much, he turned to the King of Prussia, and to Prince Schwartzberg, who represented the Emperor of Austria, and asked them whether they concurred in his opinion. Alexander then made several noble and generous remarks, and betrayed considerable emotion. It is but justice to acknowledge that in his intervention in the affairs of France he was at the outset actuated by the most magnanimous feeling.

The conduct of the Archbishop of Malines was curious on this occasion. It will be best painted in colors borrowed from his own palette. "When the Emperor asked me my opinion," said he, in his description of the above scene, "I eagerly declared we were all Royalists—that ALL France was of the same opinion—that we had only observed silence on account of the Congress of Châtillon" (that is to say, through fear). To this the Abbé added a thousand fine things of the same sort. Thus the business of the Council was settled. I have neither added nor invented. The affair was reported in the journals; but not with the above details, for the authenticity of which I am enabled to vouch.

*This remark of M. de Talleyrand is a terrible condemnation on the Senate. It would lead to the inference that if the Senate had protested against the arbitrary commands of Napoleon, it would have been seconded by France.

The Senate was convoked on the 1st of April. On the 2d the Act of Abdication was declared, and on the 3d the wreck of the Legislative Body declared its concurrence in the abdication. Napoleon was at Fontainebleau with Berthier, Maret, Caulaincourt, Bertrand, and the majority of the marshals.

Few persons are aware that Napoleon was doomed to death during the few days which preceded his abdication, by a band of conspirators composed of the most distinguished Chiefs of the army. "But," said one of them in the Council in which these demons discussed their atrocious project, "what are we to do with him? There are two or three among us who, like Antony,* would exhibit their blood-stained robes to the people, and make us play the parts of Cassius and Brutus. I have no wish to see my house burned, and to be sent into exile." "Well," said another, "we must leave no trace of him. He must be sent to heaven like Romulus." The others applauded, and then a most horrible discussion commenced.

It is not in my power to relate the details. Suffice it to say that the Emperor's death was proposed and discussed for the space of an hour, with a degree of coolness which might be expected among Indian savages armed with tomahawks. "But," said he who had spoken first, "we must come to some determination. The Emperor of Russia is impatient. The month of April is advancing, and nothing has been done. Now, for the last time, we will speak to him of his abdication. He must sign it definitely—or——" A horrible gesture followed this last word.

* They alluded to the Duke of Bassano, Caulaincourt, Bertrand, and some others.

Yes, the life of Napoleon was threatened by those very men whom he had loaded with wealth, honors, and favors, to whom he had given luster from the reflection of his own glory. Napoleon was warned of the conspiracy, and it must have been the most agonizing event of his whole life. The torments of Saint Helena were nothing in comparison with what he must have suffered when a pen was presented to him by a man who presumed to say, "Sign—if you wish to live." If these last words were not articulated, the look, the gesture, the inflection of the voice, expressed more than the tongue could have uttered.

The Emperor of Russia wished to ascertain the feeling of the army before he adopted a final resolution. Napoleon made choice of Marshal Macdonald, Marshal Lefebvre, Marshal Oudinot, the Duke of Vicenza, Marshal Ney, and the Duke of Bassano, to bear to the Emperor Alexander the propositions which he had to make to the Allied Powers. Some time previous to this occurred a scene the remembrance of which fills me with indignation against the man whom it almost exclusively concerns. I allude to Berthier.

The Prince of Neufchâtel was with the Emperor, and he invented an excuse for leaving him, alleging that his presence was required in Paris, for the purpose of securing some papers which were of importance to the Emperor himself. While he spoke, Napoleon looked at him with melancholy surprise, which, however, Berthier did not or would not observe. "Berthier," said Napoleon, taking his hand, "you see that I have need of consolation—and how much I require at this moment to be surrounded by my true friends." He pronounced these last words emphatically. Berthier made no reply. Napoleon continued: "You will be back to-morrow, Berthier?" "Certainly, Sire," replied the Prince of Neufchâtel. And he left the Emperor's cabinet with treason in his heart.

After his departure, Napoleon remained for some time silent. He followed him with his eyes, and when Berthier was out of sight, he cast them down toward the ground, on which he looked thoughtfully for several minutes. At length he advanced to the Duke of Bassano, and laying his hand on his arm he pressed it forcibly, and said:

"Maret, he will not come back." He then threw himself dejectedly into a chair. He was right. Berthier did not return.

The Duke of Ragusa had left his army corps under the command of General Souham. This corps was in the neighborhood of Essonne. Marshal Marmont was still undetermined as to what course he should adopt. The Convention which, on the 5th of April, had been concluded at Chevilly between him and Prince Schwartzberg had been disavowed. But there was one thing very unpardonable in the Duke of Ragusa, which was his having sent a copy of the Act of Abdication, which was not yet known, to the army; and the remarks which accompanied the document sufficiently explained what were his motives for sending it.

General Souham then thought that if the Emperor should return to power they had gone too far to retract—that they were lost; and in the absence of the Duke of Ragusa he determined for himself as to what course he should adopt. He told the troops that they were to march against the enemy. The soldiers joyfully flew to arms; but they continued their march to a considerable distance without, as they expected, coming up with the enemy. At length, when they reached the neighborhood of Versailles, they discovered they had been deceived.

They then turned furiously against their generals, who were well-nigh being sacrificed to their anger and disappointment. Cries of "Vive l'Empereur! Mort aux étrangers! Mort aux Prussiens! Mort aux Russes!" resounded on every side. This news speedily reached Paris, but not soon enough to enlighten the Emperor Alexander. But did he wish it? This is a secret which it is impossible to divine. And yet I think he was sincere on his first arrival in Paris.

The particulars of the deputation of the marshals to the Emperor of Russia have been detailed in so many publications that I think it unnecessary to repeat them here. I may merely mention that the number of marshals being complete, the Emperor wished to add Marshal Macdonald, and he said to the Duke of Bassano: "I wish to include the Duke of Tarentum. He is not attached to me; but I know him to be an honest man, and for that reason his voice will have more weight with the Emperor of Russia than any other. Write to him, Maret."

Then, after a moment's reflection, he added: "But poor Marmont! He will be grieved that I do not include him in the deputation. Well, Maret, we must have his name in it too. Set down Macdonald's name. But do not erase Marmont's." I know not whether the Duke of Ragusa was ever made acquainted with this fact. If so, I think it must have caused him a pang of regret.

The marshals, after a long conference with Napoleon, set out for Paris. They stopped at Petit-Bourg, at the Headquarters of the Prince of Wirtemberg to take fresh escorts. Marshal Marmont did not alight from his carriage, which was remarked as extraordinary. On their arrival in Paris they immediately waited on the Emperor of Russia. There Marmont evinced signs of great agitation. It was doubtless caused by grief—for he was not a traitor. No, he was incapable of that; but he was unhappy, and no wonder, if he knew the extent of the mischief he had done. When the marshals entered the apartment in which the Emperor of Russia was in readiness to receive them, Marmont did not accompany them. Was he at that time aware of the step which Souham had taken?

The Emperor of Russia gave the marshals an attentive hearing. Doubtless his determination was formed; but he would not even in appearance, put any restraint upon the nation. The abdication in favor of Napoleon II., by his father, was one of the three measures proposed to the Council, the rejection of which had been brought about by M. de Talleyrand.

The Emperor of Russia spoke on the question with considerable warmth. The arguments brought forward in favor of the son of Napoleon appeared to produce an impression on him. Above all things, civil war was in his opinion most to be dreaded. At the moment when he appeared to be ready to yield the point in question, one of his officers delivered to him a packet. He opened it, and his countenance suddenly changed.

"How is this, gentlemen," said he to the marshals, in a tone of reproach. "You are treating with me in the name of the army. You give me assurance of its sentiments, and at the same moment I receive intelligence that the army corps of the Duke of Ragusa has adhered to the Act of Abdication as proclaimed by the Senate!" He exhibited to them the declaration of adherence, signed by all the generals and superior officers of the 5th corps. From that moment all was at an end. The Emperor declared that everything had been unalterably settled.

Such was the answer conveyed to Napoleon. On receiving it he was more deeply afflicted at finding himself abandoned by the men whom he had created than by the loss of his Crown. The Duke of Bassano assured me that the Emperor never appeared to him so truly great as at that moment. Throughout the whole day his conversation turned on subjects of the most gloomy kind, and he dwelt much on suicide. He spoke so frequently on this subject that Marchand, his first valet de chambre, and Constant were struck with it. They consulted together, and both with common consent removed from the Emperor's chamber an Arabian poniard and the balls from his pistol case.*

The Duke of Bassano had also remarked this continued allusion to suicide, notwithstanding his efforts to divert Napoleon's thoughts from it. The Duke spoke to Marchand, after he had taken leave of the Emperor previous to retiring to rest, and he expressed himself satisfied with the precautions which had been taken.

The Duke had been in bed some time, when he was awoke by Constant, who came to him pale and trembling. "M. le Duc," he exclaimed, "come immediately to the Emperor! His Majesty has been taken very ill!" The Duke of Bassano immediately hurried to the bedside of the Emperor, whom he found pale and cold as a marble statue. He had taken poison!

When Napoleon departed for his second campaign in Russia, Corvisart gave him some poison of so subtle a nature that in a few minutes, even in a few seconds, it would produce death. This poison was the same as that treated of by Cabanis, and consisted of the prussic acid which has subsequently been ascertained to be so fatal in its effects. It was with this same poison that Condorcet terminated his existence.

* Marchand, as is well known, accompanied Napoleon to the Isle of Elba, and subsequently to Saint Helena. Constant, who imagined that he had been ill treated by the Emperor, quitted his service at Fontainebleau, after having received 50,000 francs from the funds of his royal master to repair his house.

Napoleon constantly carried it about him. It was inclosed in a little bag hermetically sealed, and suspended round his neck. As he always wore a flannel waistcoat next to his skin, the little bag had for a long time escaped the observation of Marchand, and he had forgotten it. Napoleon was confident in the efficacy of this poison, and regarded it as the means of being master of himself. He swallowed it on the night above mentioned, after having put his affairs in order and written some letters. He had tacitly bidden farewell to the Duke of Bassano and some of his other friends, but without giving them cause for the slightest suspicion. The poison was, as I have already observed, extremely violent in its nature; but, by reason of its subtlety, it was the more liable to lose its power by being kept for any length of time. This happened in the present instance. It caused the Emperor dreadful pain, but it did not prove fatal.

When the Duke of Bassano perceived him in a condition closely resembling death, he knelt down at his bedside and burst into tears. "Ah, Sire!" he exclaimed; "what have you done?" The Emperor raised his eyes and looked at the Duke with an expression of affection; then, stretching to him his cold, damp hand, he said: "You see, God has decreed that I shall not die! He, too, condemns me to suffer!"

The Duke of Bassano could never relate this scene without the most painful emotion. The affair was but little known at the time of its occurrence, notwithstanding the importance which was attached to the most trivial act of Napoleon. But it was deemed prudent to conceal from the knowledge of the multitude everything calculated to excite sympathy for the victim and indignation against his persecutors.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

Marmont and the Convention of Chevilly—Indignation of the Troops against Marmont—The 4th of April at Fontainebleau—The Abdication—Napoleon's Forbearance—Carnot and Napoleon—M. Czernicheff—M. Platow's Appetite—How Madame Junot's Servants Proposed to Get Rid of Him—The Effect of the Drug—M. Volinski—Grand Ceremony of Expiation—A Te Deum.

WHEN the Provisional Government saw that the army, which was described as being in a state of subjection, was, on the contrary, in open revolt, an order was sent to the Duke of Ragusa directing him to depart immediately and restore order. When it was understood that the Marshal was in the neighborhood of Versailles, a plan was laid to assassinate him. I could myself name several officers who were fully resolved to strike the blow. A fault in the unfortunate Convention of Chevilly had exasperated not only the officers, but the soldiers—this was the stipulation of a place of secure retirement for the Emperor and his family.

There was, it must be confessed, in Marmont's conduct in this affair, a touch of IMPUDENCE. I am sorry to employ this word, but it comes naturally to the point of my pen. Did he mean to tell the French people that the safety of Napoleon—of that Colossus whose powerful hands had controlled the two hemispheres—depended upon him? On his arrival at Versailles, Marmont dared not venture to present himself to his troops. He acquainted the General Officers with his arrival, and retired to a farm at Grand Montreuil. The General Officers did not choose to take the responsibility on their own heads, and they took with them a number of officers of every rank. The unfortunate Marmont was thus surrounded by an accusing circle, who raised cries of vengeance which might well have excited terror in a man less injured to danger than the Duke of Ragusa. "But what would you have done in my place?" he exclaimed, in a moment of despair.

All were appeased by the abdication of the Emperor! That act may be regarded as the noblest of Napoleon's life. It was not duly appreciated by a nation like the French, who consider everything with levity. He might have returned to Paris in disguise and have excited an insurrection: the Allied Sovereigns might have been massacred, and the streets deluged with blood. But he chose to descend from the Throne rather than to continue on it by such means.

On the 4th of April the Emperor reviewed at Fontainebleau his Guard and the troops who still remained faithful to him. Marshal Ney, Marshal Lefebvre, and Marshal Oudinot were present at this review. The Emperor had very properly forbidden any of the journals from being circulated among the military. He still cherished hope. The review passed off very quietly. When it was ended, Marshal Lefebvre entered the cabinet. "Sire," said he, in a voice faltering with emotion, "you would not listen to your faithful servants! You are lost! The Senate has declared the abdication!" Marshal Lefebvre had advised Napoleon to defend himself in Paris.

The Guard still continued faithful, but the troops of the Line had been tampered with. The Duke of Bassano was still at Fontainebleau. He would not leave the Emperor, and spared no effort to sustain his fortitude. The Duke of Reggio was likewise at Fontainebleau. After the parade on the 5th, the Emperor sent for him, and asked whether he thought the troops would follow him to Italy. "No, Sire," replied the Marshal; "your Majesty has abdicated!" "Yes, but on certain conditions!" "Soldiers cannot discern these nice distinctions," observed the Marshal. The Emperor made no reply.

At one in the morning Marshals Ney and Macdonald returned from Paris. Marshal Ney, who entered first, said: "Sire, we have succeeded only in part." And he related how the defection of the 5th corps had prevented them from settling the question of the abdication by securing the succession of his son. Napoleon was deeply wounded by the conduct of the troops confided to the command of Marmont. Marmont certainly was not a traitor; and yet no traitor could have done greater mischief.

"To what place am I to retire with my family?" inquired Napoleon. "Wherever your Majesty may please. To the Isle of Elba, for example, with a revenue of six millions." "Six millions! that is a large allowance, considering that I am only a soldier." At that moment Napoleon had with him at Fontainebleau the troops of Macdonald, Mortier, Lefebvre, and Marmont. These different corps amounted altogether to 45,000 men. Deducting 12,000 as the number of Marmont's corps, there remained 33,000, with which Napoleon might have commenced civil war. Before the expiration of a fortnight he would have doubled his forces. His forbearance, in this particular, has never been fully acknowledged. It has even been pronounced want of firmness! His abdication was prompted by a noble impulse of his generous nature. He abdicated to save France from the horrors of civil war.

It has been frequently alleged that Napoleon was a tyrant, who punished with imprisonment or exile all who ventured to utter a word in opposition to his will. It would be easy to quote a thousand examples in refutation of these assertions; but it will suffice to mention the cases of Carnot and Lafayette. Carnot refused to sanction the Consulate for life—the Empire, and its hereditary succession. He was firm and honest in his opinions, and he never expressed a sentiment in opposition to his conscience. He was a truly noble-minded man. The Emperor, who knew and esteemed his integrity, never reproached him for the line of conduct he had adopted; but, at the same time, he never bestowed upon him any favor—this was perfectly natural.

In 1809, Carnot, after having governed provinces and had mountains of gold at his disposal, was reduced to very straitened circumstances. A severe loss which he sustained left him no alternative but a prison, or to appeal to the generosity of a friend. He required eighty thousand francs to extricate him from his embarrassment. Where could he find a friend who would go such a length to serve him?

After several days of bitter inquietude (for a prison is a fearful prospect to a man of spirit, whatever may be the cause that drives him into it), Carnot came to the conclusion that there was but one man in Paris to whom he could address himself without humiliation, and that man was his enemy—it was the Emperor!

Carnot wrote to Napoleon. His letter was what might be expected from such a man. On receiving it the Emperor was deeply moved. He had a heart formed to understand the noble spirit of the writer. He mentioned the affair to the Duke of Bassano; in him, too, Carnot found a responsive hearer.

"Carnot must be extricated from this difficulty," said Napoleon; "but how can we manage it? One cannot offer money to such a man. Maret, you must draw up a memorial in which you will propose to me to allow him the arrears of his pay as a Lieutenant-General during the time he held that rank previous to the formation of the Empire, and send him an order for the amount. You must also send him a brevet for a pension of 12,000 francs, the arrears of which will likewise be due to him, for he shall have a Senatorship. In this manner he will be under no obligation, except to his country, of which I am merely the organ."

Carnot received the brevets above mentioned, and was thus enabled to fulfill his engagements without incurring the insupportable burden of a favor. He felt and acknowledged Napoleon's generosity, and he stood nobly by him in the hour of adversity.

With the Emperor Alexander there arrived in Paris a number of Russians who had been our visitors on former occasions. Among them was M. Czernicheff. He was the most agreeable of all. I have several times had occasion to mention him in the course of these "Memoirs." As soon as he arrived he came to pay me a visit.

M. Czernicheff spoke about the position of France with admirable judgment and shrewdness. He was remarkable for the readiness with which he took a mental coup d'œil of things, and his opinions were always unbiased by prejudice. The conversation turned on various persons who had played a distinguished part during the Empire, and I was much surprised to learn that the Emperor Alexander entertained toward some of them not merely a prejudice, but a sort of dislike, which caused him to refuse seeing them. One of these persons was the Duke of Rovigo. I was amazed at hearing this. Czernicheff did not tell me the cause of this dislike, but I afterward learned it.

"And how have you been treated amid all these changes?" inquired M. Czernicheff.

"But indifferently," I replied. "I have a person quartered in my house who, disagreeable as he is, might be endured. But his followers are absolutely insufferable. They give my servants no rest."

"Whom do you allude to?" inquired M. Czernicheff.

"To Platow."

"Platow! he is lodged at Madame de Remusat's."

"That is the father, but the son is here, as my cook can testify, for he regularly dispatches twelve different dishes at his déjeuner, exclusive of the dessert, which is equally copious, as my maitre d'hôtel well knows."

This was nothing more than the truth. Never did any animal walking on two legs exhibit such an example of gluttony.

Then I had the most bitter complaints from my femme de charge. She came to me one day and said she could no longer bear to see such destruction. She was every day obliged to give out a pair of sheets for M. Platow, because he thought proper to go to bed in his boots. Consequently, the sheets were not only covered with mud, but were slit in enormous rents by the spurs of the young DAUPHIN of the banks of the Don. Poor Blanche was exceedingly careful of my household linen, which was very fine, and she was not sparing of her imprecations on the RUSSIAN SAVAGES. At length, after a day or two, I observed that her anger was somewhat appeased, and I inquired whether our guest was behaving better.

"By no means, madame," said she; "but I now give him the coarse sheets belonging to the stablemen. They are far too good for a savage like him," she added in a contemptuous tone.

Another incident of a similar nature occurred among my servants. They were so disgusted at the gluttonous appetite of young Platow that they determined to give him a little wholesome correction. For this purpose they resorted to a scheme which I should certainly have prohibited had I been informed of it in time.

They procured a small quantity of an emetic drug, and mixed it not only in the dishes which were served for the Cossack's déjeuner, but also in his wine and the bottle of brandy which he regularly swallowed after EVERY MEAL. They might have killed him; but they had no idea they were incurring any such danger, and were merely intent on amusing themselves with what they conceived to be a most admirable joke.

Platow that day ate with more than his usual appetite, which was remarked with great satisfaction by the valet de chambre whom I had appointed to attend upon him. Joseph was an old confidential servant who had accompanied me in all my travels. The disorder and destruction which he witnessed in the house of his mistress irritated him, and inspired him with a bitterness of feeling which did not belong to his nature.

Platow dispatched his usual hearty déjeuner, after which he swallowed a large basin of café à la crème and the remains of his bottle of brandy. Being somewhat exhausted by this exertion, he yawned, stretched out his arms, and finally threw himself on the bed, where he soon began to snore so loudly that Joseph feared he would shatter the panes of glass in the windows.

Joseph was at first surprised, but at length he became uneasy. He removed the dishes from the table without disturbing Platow. He went in and out of the room, purposely making a noise to endeavor to awaken the Cossack, but without effect. At length he approached the bedside and looked at him. He looked, as he always did, very ugly; but he was perfectly calm, and his respiration, though heavy, was very regular.

Joseph left him. Several hours elapsed, and the Cossack continued sleeping, apparently in a state of the most perfect beatitude. At five o'clock in the afternoon he awoke, and expressed himself much astonished at his long nap. Joseph, who had been the first to think of the emetic scheme, was carefully watching the result of what he termed his espèglerie. As soon as he heard the Cossack begin to yawn and swear, which were always his first signs of waking existence, Joseph entered the chamber and asked him in German how he was.

"Wonderfully well," replied he; "I have never felt myself better since I have been in Paris; it is strange, too, for I have taken no exercise, and yet I have a most keen appetite. Desire the cook to hurry the dinner!"

Joseph was petrified with astonishment.

"Say I want dinner as soon as possible," continued young Platow, without noticing the surprise of Joseph, who proceeded to the kitchen with such an air of consternation that the maitre d'hôtel exclaimed with alarm:

"Mon Dieu! is he dead?"

"Dead truly!" said Joseph, with two or three determined oaths; "dead indeed! There is no such good luck. He wants his dinner!"

"His dinner!" exclaimed the other servants.

"Impossible!" said the maitre d'hôtel. "Well, in that case we must give him another dose."

Joseph opposed the proposition.

"No, no," said he, "we have already gone far enough in this business without the knowledge of madame. I shall go and tell her all."

Accordingly he came to me, and told me how they had dosed the Cossack, and that the medicine had only had the effect of giving him a better appetite. I could scarcely refrain from laughter, but nevertheless I preserved my gravity. I told him that I considered his conduct very blamable, and desired it might not be repeated under pain of my great displeasure. I told the story to Czernicheff, who enjoyed a hearty laugh at it.

"I must let the Emperor know it," said he; "for you, madame, must be freed from this troublesome guest. To-morrow I will take care to get him removed, and I will send you, in his stead, an officer attached to the Emperor's Staff, who I think will be a protection rather than an annoyance to you."

Platow left my house next day, and I received in his place M. Volinski, Gentleman of the Chamber to the Emperor of Russia. His conduct was perfectly gentlemanly, and until the arrival of Lord Cathcart my house maintained its usual regularity.

The Emperor of Russia stopped but a short time at the house of M. de Talleyrand. He subsequently took up his residence in the Elysée Napoléon, in the suite of apartments usually occupied by the Emperor. This removal was said to have been dictated by the apprehension of meeting with mined apartments, or some other hidden danger. I know very well that the Elysée was examined by two Russian engineers, accompanied by one of the Emperor Alexander's officers. The cellars and closets were all explored with the most scrupulous care. As to the Tuileries, it being well known that the Comte d'Artois was expected to arrive, no one could, in conscience, take his place.

This was the real origin of this selection, while many people imagined it to have a very profound significance. The Emperor of Russia and the King of Prussia, in spite of their apparent confidence, were guarded with the most scrupulous vigilance. The posts of Cossacks of the Russian Imperial Guard were not limited to the Palace of the Elysée or its environs, they extended to the Boulevard from the Avenue of Marigny; and I saw Cossacks coming as far as the Champs-Élysées in their sentinel walks.

About this time a ceremony took place in Paris, at which I was present, because there was nothing in it that could be mortifying to a French heart. The death of Louis XVI. had long been admitted to be one of the most serious misfortunes of the Revolution. The Emperor Napoleon never spoke of that Sovereign but in terms of the highest respect, and always prefixed the epithet UNFORTUNATE to his name. The ceremony to which I have alluded was proposed by the Emperor of Russia and the King of Prussia.

It consisted of a kind of expiation and purification of the spot on which Louis XVI. and the Queen were beheaded. I went to see this ceremony, and I had a place at a window in the Hôtel of Madame de Remusat, next to the Hôtel de Crillon, and what was termed the Hôtel de Courlande. The ceremony took place on the 10th of April. The weather was extremely fine, and warm for the season. The Emperor of Russia and King of Prussia, accompanied by Prince Schwartzemberg, took their station at the entrance of the Rue Royale, the King of Prussia being on the right of the Emperor Alexander, and Prince Schwartzemberg on his left. There was a long parade, during which the Russian, Prussian, and Austrian military bands vied with each other in playing the air Vive Henri Quatre. The cavalry defiled, and then withdrew into the Champs-Élysées; but the infantry ranged themselves round an altar which was raised in the middle of the Place, and which was elevated on a platform having twelve or fifteen steps.

The Emperor of Russia alighted from his horse, and, followed by the King of Prussia, the Grand-Duke Constantine, Lord Cathcart, and Prince Schwartzberg, advanced to the altar. When the Emperor had nearly reached the altar, the Te Deum commenced. At the moment of the benediction, the Sovereigns and persons who accompanied them, as well as the twenty-five thousand troops who covered the Place, all knelt down. On rising, the Grand-Duke Constantine took off his hat, and immediately salvos of artillery were heard. The Greek priest presented the cross to the Emperor Alexander, who kissed it; his example was followed by the individuals who accompanied him, though they were not of the Greek faith.*

Dispersion of the Imperial Family—Judas and Saint Peter—The Emperor of Austria's Arrival in Paris—Napoleon's Act of Abdication Signed—Forfeiture of Majorats—M. Metternich's Advice—Visit to Me from the Emperor of Russia—The Bronze Figure of Napoleon—Alexander's Opinion of the Duke of Rovigo—The Duke of Bassano—Junot's Portrait—The Emperor's Departure—His Majesty's Second Visit—His Conversation on the Duke of Vicenza—His Admiration of Paris—Promises His Influence in Favor of My Son's Majorats—Lord Cathcart.

THE Empress Maria Louisa was now at Rambouillet, and was preparing to set out for Germany. Napoleon's brothers and sisters were all scattered about in various places. Queen Hortense was in Paris; the Empress Josephine was at Malmaison; the Princess Pauline was in Provence, residing at a country house near Orgon; Madame Mère and Cardinal Fesch were on their way from Lyons to Rome; Jérôme and Joseph were about to depart to America, and Lucien was in England. The different members of the Imperial Family were all separated and dispersed, while the other proscribed family were returning to the land of their fathers. The Comte d'Artois re-entered Paris after an exile of twenty-two years.

Every day the journals were filled with the names of generals who seemed to fancy that their adherence to the new Government could not be declared speedily enough, or in terms sufficiently servile. This was most indecent conduct in persons who had all their lives enjoyed the favors of the man toward whom some of them now acted the part of Judas, and others that of Saint Peter. And yet the Emperor's Act of Abdication, though signed, or at least assented to by him, had not appeared. It was not published till the 12th.

M. de Metternich came to Paris with the Emperor of Austria. They arrived, I think, on the 14th or 15th of April. Though honored with the friendship of M. de Metternich, yet I never conversed with him on the political affairs of the time. I may, therefore, without reserve state what I presume to have been his sentiments, as if he were a stranger to me.

I have reason to believe that both he and the Emperor of Austria were much disappointed at not having reached Paris in time to secure the Regency for Maria Louisa, and to make Russia declare in favor of the Imperial Orphan. The Emperor of Austria experienced, on his entry into Paris, a truly Imperial reception. This was not intended as a mark of honor to the House of Hapsburg: it was an artful political contrivance for dazzling the Emperor Francis, and stifling any regrets which might have led him to say: "If my daughter had been Regent here!" But while he was lingering on the road from Dijon, Maria Louisa, the Empress of the French, became Grand-Duchess of Parma and Placentia!

The reception given to the Emperor Francis was superb. The passage of carriages or any other vehicles was prohibited through a great portion of the capital. The streets were lined with troops and bands of music. In short, it was a perfect fête.

At length the Emperor Napoleon's Act of Abdication was made public.* It is simple and noble, and worthy of him in his most glorious days:

"The Allied Powers having proclaimed the Emperor Napoleon to be the only obstacle to the re-establishment of peace in Europe, the

* An interesting facsimile of this document, which was entirely in the autograph of Napoleon, will be found in Bourrienne's "Memoirs." It is blotted, and nearly illegible, and bears tokens of the manner in which an unwelcome duty is hurried over.

Emperor Napoleon, faithful to his oath, declares that he renounces for himself and his heirs the Thrones of France and Italy, and that there is no sacrifice, even that of life, which he is not ready to make for the interests of France.

Berthier, Prince of Neufchâtel, sent in his adherence to the new Government, dated the 11th of April. For some time the Emperor had observed him biting his nails and absorbed in reverie. He guessed his intention.

When the Emperor's abdication was made public—when our allegiance was annulled—I, in common with many others, began to turn our thoughts to the fate that awaited our families. M. de Metternich, whom I had seen the day after his arrival, told me that the majorats would be forfeited, with the exception of those in Illyria and the kingdom of Italy,—those, in short, under the dominion of Austria.

"Mine," observed I, "are in Westphalia, Prussia, and Hanover." M. de Metternich shook his head, and said: "I am much afraid that you will lose them all." But when I showed him the titles of a portion of them, producing a revenue of about fifty thousand francs, he said that they might possibly be restored to me in virtue of my claims, which had been confirmed by the King of Prussia himself. He referred to the territories and castle of Acken, which had been the personal property of the King of Prussia, but ceded by him in three different treaties, and which he had a right, if he chose, to relinquish.

"Assert your claim," said M. de Metternich; "I will use all my influence to support it; but if you would take my advice, you would first of all appeal for the protection of the Emperor Alexander. He has great influence over the King of Prussia."

I mentioned the business to M. Czernicheff, and expressed my wish to obtain an audience of the Emperor of Russia. "I will mention your wish," replied M. Czernicheff; "but I doubt whether he will grant it," added he, laughing. "Why not?" "I don't know; but I could lay a wager he will not," he said, still laughing. "His Majesty's refusal cannot be caused by any very serious fault of mine, since it appears to afford you so much amusement." Next day M. Czernicheff brought the answer. "I told you how it would be," said he; "the Emperor will not receive you at the Elysée." "Good heavens!" I exclaimed, quite surprised and mortified, "what have I done to displease him?"

M. Czernicheff continued speaking as though he did not hear me. "He will not receive you at the Elysée, because he says he wishes to DO HIMSELF THE HONOR of coming to see you. These were his own words; what do you think of them?" "This kind condescension touches me to the very heart," I replied. "Yes," added M. Czernicheff; "his Majesty wishes to pay a visit to the widow of the man of whom he has so frequently heard and read." He further added that the Emperor of Russia would be with me next day between twelve and one o'clock, if that time WOULD BE CONVENIENT TO ME.

I must confess that I was totally unprepared for this excess of Imperial courtesy; and notwithstanding all I had heard the Duke of Vicenza say of the Emperor Alexander, I scarcely believed that he would have carried his condescension so far. Next day about one o'clock the Emperor arrived. I then resided in my Hôtel in the Rue des Champs-Élysées. He was alone, in an open carriage, and had but one servant with him. I hurried to the head of the staircase to receive him, leading by the hand my little son, scarcely three years of age.

As soon as the Emperor saw me he bowed in recognition of the mistress of the house; then, taking my hand, he conducted me into the apartment with an air of kindness and affability. When we had reached the inner drawing-room, preceding the billiard-room, I stopped, and after thanking the Emperor for having come to visit a widow and her young family, I presented my children to him, who made their obeisance to his Majesty and withdrew.

I then remained alone with the Emperor of Russia. I found myself quite in a new character—that of a petitioner to a foreign Sovereign! I who had never but once solicited anything, even from the Emperor Napoleon. But I was a mother! That consideration prompted my suit.

"Sire," said I, "those children whom your Majesty has just seen have lost their father at a very early age. In this we walked up and down the billiard-room and the salon. The Emperor led me to an armchair at the side of the fireplace; he then drew a small chair in front of me, and seated himself on it.

"Sire," said I, rising, "I cannot possibly suffer your Majesty to sit on that chair." "Pray resume your seat, madame," said he, with a charming smile; "I prefer sitting here in order to hear you the more distinctly. You know I am deaf in one ear." He then again seated himself before me, and our conversation commenced; I noted it down as soon as the Emperor left me.

"First of all," said Alexander, "let me know what is the boon you have to solicit from me. Explain the affair to me that I may understand it." I stated my case to him. "The matter appears to me to be beyond a doubt," said he. "Draw up an explanatory note of the business, and I will MYSELF give it to the King of Prussia. Czernicheff shall take charge of this affair by my order, and shall report to you the result. He is a friend of yours, I believe?"

I replied in the affirmative, and added that I thought him an excellent man, possessing more merit than most persons were for a long time willing to give him credit for, because he was a man of fashion and agreeable manners. "But," said the Emperor, laughing, "I should have imagined that in France those were additional claims to favor." "Sometimes, Sire."

At that moment Alexander directed his eye toward a console on which stood a small bronze figure of the Emperor Napoleon, about two feet and a half high, and clothed in the Imperial robes. The Emperor of Russia looked at it for some moments, then turning from it he remained silent. This silence was embarrassing to us both. At length Alexander broke it, saying: "One thing which particularly struck me on my entrance into Paris was the vast number of persons, especially women and children, in mourning."

"Sire," returned I, "your Majesty would have seen a great many more if all the widows and orphans in Paris had gone to meet you. As for my family and myself,

I can only say that your Majesty neither saw my widow's weeds nor the mourning of my children." Alexander took my hand, and pressing it in a friendly manner, he said: "I know it, I know it."

Then again, turning to look at the figure of Napoleon, he said, as if speaking to himself: "I do assure you, Duchess, that I loved that man as much—perhaps I may say more—than any one of my brothers, and when he betrayed me I suffered more by his treachery than by the war he brought upon me. Would you believe, madame, that the officer who brought me the first intelligence that the Emperor Napoleon had crossed the Vistula was imprisoned and put into irons? Yes, had Napoleon been willing to maintain the fraternity of arms and of hearts which subsisted between us at Erfurth, I confidently believe that we should have rendered Europe the finest part of the universe." As he uttered these last words he rose and began to walk rapidly up and down the room.

"But Napoleon was surrounded by a set of men who have ruined him. One of them in particular—one of them is to me the object of an aversion which I can never overcome!" He paused—I could not venture to question him. "That man," resumed Alexander, "has committed thousands of iniquities in the name of Napoleon for which his unfortunate master is now called to account. I allude to the Duke of Rovigo!" I knew he did, and I was in no way astonished to hear him mention the name.

Alexander, who had been walking about, now came and resumed his seat on the chair near me: "One might almost suppose that you had guessed to whom I alluded?" I smiled. "Has he, then, behaved equally ill to his comrades?" "Not to all of them, Sire; my husband had serious cause to complain of him; but still I am of opinion that your Majesty has been prepossessed against the Duke of Rovigo. He has his faults; but he cannot be accused of willfully behaving ill to the Emperor, to whom he is devotedly attached. Your Majesty has, perhaps, been misinformed, and——" "No, no," resumed he hastily, "not at all misinformed. I know the truth. That man had the insolence to attempt to introduce his police system into my Palace at St. Petersburg—to place spies about me. It exceeds all belief; and then——” He stopped, and appeared to be struggling to repress his rage.

“Since my arrival in Paris,” continued the Emperor, “he has twenty times solicited an audience of me; but I have constantly refused to receive him. I understand he intends to ask the Comte d’Artois to see him. Truly the Duke of Rovigo would do well to recollect Vincennes. He ought also to screen an innocent man from the odium which belongs to himself; for poor Caulaincourt was at that time at Strasburg, and not at Vincennes, so that he could have had nothing to do with ordering the death of the Duc d’Enghien.”

The conversation was now becoming more and more interesting. I listened with a degree of attention and interest which must doubtless have been visibly depicted in my countenance, for the Emperor’s politeness became more marked. He once more sat down beside me, for he rose and sat down by turns. “The Duke of Bassano,”* continued he, “is another person who has done the Emperor a great deal of harm.” “I am sorry to differ from your Majesty,” observed I. “There is no man in France who would more readily lay down his life for the Emperor than M. de Bassano.” “What matters that, if he has not served him dutifully?”

“Sire, is it not possible that unjust, perhaps even malignant, reports may have reached your Majesty’s ear, and influenced you against the Duke of Bassano? He is an able statesman, a man of talent and incorruptible integrity. He has been a martyr to the cause which he served in his youth. He has never forsaken his principles, and has always been devoted to his country. These sentiments are innate in him. When M. de Bassano sent in his adherence to the Provisional Government, it was because he thought France could now only be saved by the union of her children.”

I stopped short, and felt quite astonished at having said so much. But I could not refrain from speaking the truth in defense of my friend, and then the affability of the Emperor of Russia divested me of all fear. His Majesty listened to me attentively, and when I had ended, he said: “Was the Duke of Abrantès on very cordial terms of friendship with the Duke of Bassano?" "He was, Sire; and, besides, my husband was from the same province as M. de Bassano. They were both natives of Burgundy, and I may almost add that they were brothers-in-arms!" "How?" "Because M. de Bassano was never absent from a single battle in which the Emperor was engaged. He is a brave man, and has exposed himself to all the dangers of a soldier's life without the hope of a soldier's recompense; for the only reward he would have gained by having a leg or an arm shot off would be not to have the benefit of the Invalides." Alexander smiled.

"Ah!" resumed he; "I did not know he was so brave a man: and General Savary? What sort of a reputation for courage does he enjoy?" "He is a very brave man, Sire; I have always heard that admitted even by my husband, who was not easily pleased on that score." "General Junot had a glorious military reputation. The Sovereign is happy who is surrounded by such men. But how happens it, madame, that you have not your husband's portrait among your collection of pictures?" And he looked round with an air of curiosity. "If your Majesty wishes to see a portrait of Junot, and a striking likeness of him, I can show you one. But I must request your Majesty to take the trouble to step into another apartment."

I shall never forget the rapid and gracious manner in which the Emperor rose and offered me his arm. "Will you be kind enough to show me the way?" said he. I led him through the billiard-room, the library, the large cabinet fitted up in the style of an antique apartment, then through my bedchamber into another cabinet, and finally into my little boudoir, in which was the portrait of Junot.*

This portrait, the work of Baron Gros, is a mere sketch, but a hundred times more valuable than many finished pictures. The Duke of Abrantès is represented in the picturesque military costume of the generals of the Republic. At the time it was painted, Junot was scarcely twenty-seven years of age, and yet he was a Brigadier-General in the deserts of Syria, and with only three hundred French troops he defeated and destroyed four thousand Turks. Junot's reward consisted of the order of the day, and a picture painted at the expense of the Government by one of our most able artists. There was a competition, and Junot gave the prize to Gros. The sketch of Junot's head was made by Gros for the purpose of being copied into the large picture to be called "The Battle of Nazareth."

"Did not Napoleon treat the Duke of Abrantès very unjustly?" resumed the Emperor, as if sorry for having so far disclosed his feelings.

"Yes, Sire; but he was nevertheless much attached to Junot, and I know that he was deeply grieved by his death."

"Have you seen him since that event?"

"No, Sire."

"How happens that?"

"Because he has always been absent from Paris, and I have been in the country."

"Is that the only reason?"

I made no reply.

"Tell me, did you not write to the Emperor, when you were at Geneva or Lausanne?"

I raised my eyes to the Emperor Alexander with great astonishment. He continued:

"Your letter fell into my hands, together with several others, which were captured with an estafette, after the Battle of Dresden. I believe, too, an Auditor of the Council of State, bearing dispatches to the Emperor Napoleon, was also made prisoner by my Cossacks. To the best of my recollection, this happened on the day after the death of Moreau. In your letter to Napoleon, you addressed him with the courage and candor of a noble heart, and I formed a high idea of the woman who could write so. From some passages in that letter, I observed that your feelings had been wounded to the quick by the Duke of Rovigo, who is truly like an evil genius to the good and the unfortunate. However, I know not whether you will be pleased or displeased, when I tell you, that the Emperor never received your letter.* Are you sorry for this?"

*The Czar was very proud of the rôle of amateur detective, and another instance is given of his boasting of the violation of private correspondence in the "Memoirs of Marshal Macdonald" (1893 edition, p. 334)

"Perhaps not, Sire. My first impulse may have carried me too far. However, I have no very distinct recollection of what I wrote."

"You wrote like a noble-minded woman; and without having the honor to know you, I conceived for you a very high esteem."

"But, Sire, permit me to say that your Majesty judges me wrongly if you suppose me to be the enemy of Napoleon. He has doubtless caused me much pain; but still, I cherish for his name, for his glory, a profound veneration amounting to a sort of worship."

On his departure the Emperor bowed to me with the easy grace of a polished gentleman, free from anything approaching to royal hauteur. I followed him out of the room, when, suddenly turning round and perceiving me, he said: "Why do you leave the room, madame?" We were by this time at the head of the staircase. "Sire," said I, "your Majesty will permit me——" "I will permit nothing of the kind. How! would you wish to see me to my carriage?" "Certainly, Sire," replied I, smiling, for I was amused at the astonishment with which he appeared to regard a thing which appeared to me perfectly a matter of course. "See me to my carriage!" said the Emperor, smiling in his turn. "Mon Dieu! What would be said of me in St. Petersburg if I allowed myself to be escorted by a lady?"

"But we are not in St. Petersburg, Sire," said I; "and I entreat that you will permit me to do what I conceive to be the duty of the mistress of a house toward a Sovereign visitor." "Nay, nay," said the Emperor, taking my hand, and conducting me back to the door of the drawing-room, "the conquered must submit to the conqueror"; and then he added, with a charming grace: "Suppose I COMMAND you to stay where you are?" "I am not your Majesty's subject, Sire." "Well, then, you will prevent my paying you another visit. Surely you will not punish me so far as that?" "That fear, Sire, insures my ready obedience. I will not stir another step." He then descended the staircase, running as if to prevent my following him.

Some days after this visit of the Emperor Alexander, he called on me again one morning. He had given me no intimation of this intended honor. He came on foot, and quite unattended, and was dressed in plain clothes, wearing a round hat and a green coat. If Joseph, my valet de chambre, had not happened to recognize him, he would have been upstairs and into my boudoir before I was aware of his being in the house.

On this second visit he was even more gracious and communicative than on the first. Everyone must acknowledge the charm of this sort of affability in a Sovereign; it carries with it a PRESTIGE, the influence of which must be felt by persons of the coldest temperament.* Besides, in 1814, Alexander was really great. Yes, the term GREAT may truly be applied to the man who, having the cup of revenge within his reach, averts his lips from the delicious beverage. This is being something superior to human nature! On this occasion Alexander spoke to me of Napoleon. He had abdicated, and his fate was sealed.

"Have you seen the Duke of Vicenza?"† inquired Alexander, with an expression which I could not but remark. "I have, Sire." "I am glad to hear it. But how had you the courage to do so? It would have been all very well a month ago, but within the last fortnight——" "Because I had heard him less talked about within the last fortnight. I therefore called on the old friend of my childhood—him whom I so long called my brother." The Emperor Alexander approached me, took my hand, and pressed it; then, after a pause, he said: "You did right—very right. I assure you again, on my word of honor as a Sovereign, that the Duke of Vicenza is perfectly innocent of the crime with which he is charged!" This was the second time the Emperor Alexander had spoken to me with great warmth on the same subject.

Our conversation next turned on Paris, and the persons who had been most conspicuous in the Imperial Court, especially the ladies. He spoke of Madame Ney and the Empress Josephine. He seemed very curious to hear what I had to say of the latter; and frequently brought the conversation back to her, though I constantly endeavored to let it drop. At length he said, with a good-humored smile: "I almost think you are afraid of me."

* Madame de Sévigné gives a proof of this feeling in the letter in which she mentions having danced with the King.

† General Caulaincourt.

"By no means, Sire! your Majesty's kindness renders that quite impossible. But you must be aware that on such a subject I feel myself bound to be silent." He appeared to reflect for a few moments, and then he said: "You are right! This is the second lesson you have given me. I thank you."

Our conversation then changed to another subject. The Emperor spoke of our theaters, our museums, with which he was highly delighted; and he declared that the magnificent city of Paris had not its equal in the whole world. "My stony city (ma ville de pierre)," said he, "will also be a splendid place one day or other. You must come and see it; say you will; I am sure you would like St. Petersburg; and we will give you a welcome. Then you can testify on your return that we are not quite such savages as we are said to be." I was deeply touched by these words, which he uttered with the most unaffected kindness of manner.

He next spoke of the state of my affairs, and asked me in what circumstances Junot had left his family. I replied: "Without any fortune." "How! and Napoleon ——" "It was not in his power to do anything, Sire. He was in Champagne at the time of Junot's death, and his attention was engrossed by matters of greater import than making a provision for us." "But your majorats? Prince Metternich is your friend." He paused for a moment, and then continued: "It is his duty to protect you and your family." "Our majorats, Sire, are in Prussia and in Hanover, consequently M. de Metternich can do nothing in the business. He is my friend, and I will not be so unjust as to accuse him of indifference. I will not myself solicit his intervention with Prussia; it is yours I should wish to have, Sire."

The Emperor smiled. "Mine? Well, so be it. Czernicheff has begun the business, and he shall follow it up." I courtesied; and he added with charming grace: "Let it be understood. He shall arrange the business with the King of Prussia IN MY NAME. Will that satisfy you?" "The widow of Junot can wish for nothing more when she has such an advocate for her children."

A flood of tears prevented me from saying more. Alexander took my hand (an English custom which he had contracted, and which I at first thought very strange), and said: "Would it be inconvenient or unpleasant to you to have another person in your house? In the hotels near the Elysée, which have extensive suites of apartments, there is none but yours that has the ground floor unoccupied. I wish you could receive Lord Cathcart, the English Ambassador to me; and allow me to mention that you are to provide nothing but lodging room either for Lord Cathcart or his attendants. His lordship is a man of agreeable and gentlemanly manners, and his presence here will be a protection to you. Besides, as I shall sometimes have occasion to call on him, I may at the same time take the opportunity of visiting his hostess, so that I shall hear whether he gives her any reason to complain.

CHAPTER XXXV.

The Staff Officer of the Prince Royal of Sweden—Motives of Bernadotte's Visit to Paris—His Proposition to the Comte d'Artois—Visit from the Duke of Wellington—General and Lady Cole—Miss E. Rathurst—The Monster Prince—His Love Adventures.

I HAD gone out one day to take an airing. On my return home I found my servants in a state of great alarm and consternation. My valet de chambre informed me that an officer of the Staff of the Prince Royal of Sweden, accompanied by some others, had called about an hour before my return. They had taken a survey of the house from the cellar to the very uppermost rooms.

On being informed that one of the Emperor of Russia's officers lodged in the apartments overlooking the garden, the Swedish officer said, with an insolent air: "Well, he must remove." "But," said Joseph, "where are we to put him if you dislodge him?" "Is there not an apartment adjoining the billiard-room which we just passed through?" That is my mistress's apartment," said Joseph indignantly. "And, pray, who is your mistress?" said the officer, in a jeering, impertinent tone.

Joseph was greatly irritated. He had been with Junot in the campaigns of Egypt and Italy. To see our enemies in France deeply mortified him; to see them in Paris nearly broke his heart; but to be insulted by them in his master's house was more than he could possibly endure. Directing a look of the most consummate contempt at the Swedish officer, he replied:

"The mistress of this house is the widow of a man at the mention of whose name Frenchmen and foreigners should raise their hats and bow with respect." (The officer had kept on his hat.) "He was General Junot, Duke of Abrantès. If he were now living, and Governor of Paris, you would not have been allowed to enter it."

The officer replied to this only by a shrug of the shoulders, and continued to make out his list of quarters, marking the different rooms, as is customary in a conquered city. This chamber was for the Colonel, that for the General, etc. "I tell you once more," said my valet de chambre, "that this is my mistress's apartment." "I must obey my orders." "And who ordered you to come here?" "His Royal Highness the Prince of Sweden."

The officers took their departure. I returned home shortly after, and my valet de chambre related to me what had occurred. My first impulse is always impetuous; and I flew to my desk and wrote the following note:

"MONSEIGNEUR:—The Allied troops occupy Paris. I have received no offense from the officers or their inferiors of any rank whatever. I must confess that it appears to me as strange as it is vexatious that I should have experienced the first insult just at the time your Royal Highness arrived in Paris. Feeling assured that it cannot be by your orders that my house (hitherto respected by all parties) should be violated by any of your officers, I complain of what has taken place to-day in the hope that you will make me a suitable apology."

About an hour after my letter had been delivered at the Hôtel of the Prince Royal of Sweden, in the Rue d'Anjou Saint Honoré, I received a visit from his first aid-de-camp, Count Brahé. He made me a very handsome apology on the part of the Prince of Sweden, and assured me that his Royal Highness and the persons of his Household were totally ignorant of the intrusion and annoyance to which I had been exposed in his name. I was charmed with the politeness and elegant manners of Count Brahé, who seemed to have been brought up in the same school of good breeding as M. de Metternich.

Few persons could comprehend what was Bernadotte's object in coming to Paris at that time; still less could they understand his eagerness to hurl Napoleon from his throne. There was then no chance of a Republic, as on the 18th Brumaire. But though General Bernadotte had forsaken France he still loved her. His rank, as Prince Royal, had only made him change his opinions. Being no longer a Republican he had become a Royalist. The Princess of Sweden used to complain bitterly of the ennui of the frigid and gloomy Court of Sweden, which was never excited except when they shot kings at masked balls.

On hearing the Princess make these complaints, M. de Talleyrand used to say: "But really, madame, this is very well for a beginning." Bernadotte thought so, too. But the BEGINNING had unfortunately become the END, since the downfall of the great European Colossus, and Bernadotte looked fondly back to his native country. He offered to his Royal Highness, Monsieur, who had just arrived in Paris, his services in putting down the different factions which might still exist in the army, over which his name might yet have some influence.

To effect this object, he conceived it would be requisite to be invested with some imposing title, such as Generalissimo of the Forces or Lieutenant-General of the Kingdom: the latter, it is true, was the title which Monsieur himself held; but he thought it might be rendered more practically useful when possessed by Bernadotte. The latter, therefore, consented to abandon the government of his own States, and to remain a year in France if necessary.

The proposition of the Prince Royal of Sweden was made to Comte d'Artois; but after a very brief consideration his Royal Highness was informed that the sooner he returned to his own army the better. This was the reason of that sudden departure which left the Princess unprotected and a prey to the unfortunate attachment which she conceived for a man who was certainly the very last person in the world who might have been expected to play the part of a romantic lover.

At this time I was in the habit of seeing Prince Metternich every day. He frequently called on me in the morning, and almost always took tea with me in the evening. He was extremely fearful of being suspected of interfering in the affairs of France.

In reference to this subject I may relate a circumstance which took place before my departure from Paris, at the time when Louis XVIII. was forming his Ministry. Lord Wellington had been in Paris for some days before he learned that I also was there, and that I was residing very near him. He called on me, and I was much pleased and interested by his conversation. I have already mentioned that Lord Wellington was highly esteemed by the Duke of Abrantès, who had imbued me with the same favorable opinion of him, so I was the friend of Lord Wellington though the enemy of the English General. His lordship resided at the Hôtel de la Reynière, which belonged to Ouvrard.

"I have come to beg your kind reception of a new lodger," said Lord Wellington to me one day. "I allude to Lord Cathcart." "He cannot fail to be welcome, my lord," said I, "since the Emperor Alexander has introduced him."

Lord Cathcart came that same morning. As soon as he arrived he sent to say he wished to pay his respects to me. When he entered, he requested, in the most polite terms, that I would permit him to reside in my house. His manners were those of a polished man of rank, and I saw at once that I should have every reason to congratulate myself on having him quartered beneath my roof. Next morning he took possession of the suite of apartments on the ground floor. They consisted of four drawing-rooms, a spacious gallery, two small billiard-rooms, and a large cabinet, which might easily be converted into a bedchamber. This was the suite of apartments in which I used to receive company. They overlooked the gardens. There was also a bathroom attached to them.

I devoted to Lord Cathcart's use a great portion of my stables. They had become useless to me since the death of my husband; for I kept only four carriage horses and a saddle horse. Lord Cathcart assured me that he would be answerable for his servants committing no depredations, and I must in justice say that they were extremely well behaved and quiet.

My house was soon entirely filled. The apartments on the first floor, overlooking the garden, were occupied by General and Lady Cole. They occasioned no inconvenience to me; but there was a great difference between them and Lord Cathcart. This difference extended even to their servants, which I discovered to my cost.* Lady Cole was a very pleasing woman, and the General was a true model of an English country gentleman. Lady Cole often came to take tea with me in the evening. On one of these occasions she told me that she had a favor to ask of me.

"A young lady, an intimate friend of mine," said she, "is very anxious to see Paris. Her relations will intrust her to my care; but if I take charge of her she must reside with me. How can I manage this unless you grant me permission?" I assured her that I was most ready to do everything in my power to oblige her, but that I could not render the walls of my house elastic. It was already completely filled by Lord Cathcart, the General and herself, my household, my brother, and my uncles the Prince and the Abbé Comnena.

"But she can sleep in the great divan, in the boudoir," said Lady Cole, "if you have no objection." I gave my consent, though I was certain that my divan would be destroyed. But how could I refuse? "Well, since I have your consent, my young friend shall come to-morrow. Her brother is aid-de-camp to Lord Wellington, and he will himself thank you for your hospitality to his sister."

The young lady had been in Paris since the previous day; but Lady Cole had very politely declined bringing her until she had obtained my consent. When she introduced me to her I was struck with her beauty. Her fine fresh complexion, her beautiful fair hair, and her soft blue eyes, produced altogether that youthful appearance which is found only among English women. It is the same with the English children; they are always prettier than any others. A child may have a white and red complexion, and fair curly hair; it may be dressed in a white frock with a pink or blue sash—all this

* There were in my boudoir, which adjoined my bedchamber, four small landscapes painted on vellum, given to me by my brother-in-law, M. de Geouffre, and valued on account of their beauty as well as a pledge of friendship. I presume that some of the servants of Lady Cole had taken a fancy to them; for the day after her departure, when the apartments were being put in order, they were nowhere to be found.

makes a pretty child, but still it is not like an English child. It is the same with young English girls.

Lady Cole's young friend pleased me at first sight, and the hospitality which I had granted as a favor to Lady Cole became a source of gratification to myself. This young lady was Miss Eliza Bathurst, a relation of the English Secretary of the War Department. She was not only pretty and agreeable, but she possessed considerable talents and accomplishments. Alas! I little thought that the lovely flower with which I was so highly charmed would be so early blighted! Some time after her visit to Paris she accompanied her mother to Rome. It was at the time the Duc de Laval was our Ambassador there.

One day Miss Bathurst, with a party of friends, was riding on horseback along the banks of the Tiber. The weather was delightful. They were admiring the clear blue sky and the brilliant sun, which spreads a sort of magical glory over the Campagna di Roma. Suddenly Miss Bathurst's horse took fright; she endeavored to rein him in. The animal darted off, and plunged, with his rider, into the Tiber, where the young lady perished. I was deeply shocked on hearing this event, when I recollected the many attractive and amiable qualities of Miss Bathurst. Her brother, Lord Wellington's aid-de-camp, was a very fine young man. In person he resembled his sister. I do not know what became of him.

One day M. de Metternich called on me and said: "Will you promise not to laugh at a gentleman whom I wish to introduce to you?" "That must depend on what sort of person he is. You know I am very apt to laugh. But tell me who he is." "He is a friend of mine. He is not at all handsome; I tell you that beforehand. And to convince you of that fact, I may inform you that he goes by the name of the MONSTER PRINCE." "Surely you are joking!" "I am not, indeed. He has another name, it is true. His real name is Wenzel Lichtenstein. His brother, Prince Moritz Lichtenstein, has also requested me to introduce him to you, which, with your permission, I will do. The two brothers are very unlike each other. Pray behave well when you see Wenzel."

Prince Wenzel Lichtenstein was certainly the most ugly man I ever beheld in my life. He was the very perfection of ugliness. One might imagine he was endowed with this perfection by a fairy, as others are said to have been endowed with beauty. Nothing was wanting to complete it. Even his voice was the strangest that can well be imagined. I must confess that when I first saw him I was perfectly petrified.

"Well," said Metternich, the next time he called on me, "what do you think of him?" "That he is by no means handsome. That is very certain. Poor fellow! He must be very unhappy if he is tender-hearted." I made the same remark to another friend who happened to call upon me that same day. "I beg your pardon," said he, "you are quite mistaken. Prince Wenzel, ugly as he is, has made his conquests." "Impossible!" I exclaimed; "unless he happened to meet with a woman as frightful as himself." "By no means. The lady whose affections he won was very pretty. The affair made some noise not long since at Vienna."

The gentleman who gave me these particulars mentioned Princess —. I was confounded. I was assured that Prince Wenzel had had several such adventures, and that he had now become so confident that he never doubted his success with any woman. "Have a care of yourself," said my friend, who had made me thus far acquainted with the secret biography of the MONSTER PRINCE. "Upon my word," replied I, "you are right to put me on my guard, for he must possess infinite powers of seduction to have rendered himself agreeable to any woman."

CHAPTER XXXVI.

Letter from Fontainebleau—M. Corvisart—Visit to Malmaison—Josephine's Sorrow—My Opinion of Maria Louisa—Josephine's Projects—Future Duchess of Navarre—Approaching Departure of Napoleon for Elba—Augereau's Proclamation—The Emperor Leaves France—Commissioners Who Accompanied Him—General Bertrand.

I RECEIVED a letter from Fontainebleau, written in a strain of unreserved confidence. The Emperor was very ill. The poison he had taken had not been productive of the effect he expected from it, but had proved highly injurious to his health. It is worthy of remark, as illustrative of the dishonesty of the newspapers of the period, that not one of them made the slightest allusion to this poisoning. The "Gazette de France" of the 14th of April, 1814, says: "The day on which Napoleon was to sign his abdication he found on his table a packet containing the conditions of the abdication, and likewise a pistol." "Ah," said the Emperor, "they wish to counsel me; but they shall learn that I follow no advice but my own."

Be this as it may, he was now seriously ill, and M. Corvisart's attentions stood him in the utmost stead. The care with which he watched over him was only equaled by his skill. I saw Corvisart at this period: the tears were starting from the eyes of a man whose firmness of character was never known to falter! He never dwelt but with sorrow on what was taking place at Fontainebleau. I loved Corvisart as a man who had saved my life; but since 1814 I have loved him for the exalted qualities which he then displayed.

The letter I received from Fontainebleau entered into much detail respecting the preparations for the Emperor's departure. When I heard of it, though never expecting he would accept the plan which I had proposed for his adoption,* I relied at least on a verbal answer. The Duke of Rovigo afterward told me that he had not delivered my letter. I am unable to vouch for the truth of this assertion. I went to Malmaison the day after receiving the letter from Fontainebleau.

I knew the Empress Josephine to be extremely uneasy respecting the passing occurrences, and she could not fail to set a high value on any intelligence derived from the spot. It was early when I arrived, and the Empress was still in her bedroom. I repaired to Madame d'Audenarde's apartment, and begged she would inquire of her Majesty whether I might see her before breakfast. My name was no sooner mentioned to the Empress than she desired I should be admitted. She was still in bed, and stretching out her arms as soon as she saw me, she burst into tears, and exclaimed: "Alas! Madame Junot, Madame Junot!"

*This plan was somewhat singular, and is believed to have arisen solely in the ardent mind of Madame d'Abrantès. She told Savary, Duke of Rovigo, that she should write a letter to Napoleon, who was yet at Fontainebleau, proposing to him to come to her house incognito; and that at the expected second visit to her of the Emperor Alexander, he should suddenly present himself to the Autocrat and demand of him protection for his son Napoleon II.; that she knew the high opinion and affection Alexander entertained for the Emperor, and she was sure that he would listen to him, and exert his powerful interest with the other Sovereigns to secure the nomination of a Regency to act for the son. Savary undertook to deliver this letter; but, as appears by the sequel, he did not carry out the trust imposed upon him.

I was deeply affected at the meeting. I knew how sincerely she was attached to the Emperor; and at this moment every reproach she had to make was cast into shade by the heavy misfortune which oppressed him. I could read her feelings, and this burst of deep affliction found in my heart the most congenial sympathy. I wept with the afflicted Princess, and my tears were more bitter than her own, for they flowed over a sorrow which death had occasioned, whereas she had still hope. The hundred days have proved how reasonably she could indulge it.

When I told her of my having received a letter from Fontainebleau she said to me, with an eagerness she had never displayed on any former occasion: "Oh! I beseech you, do read me that letter; read THE WHOLE of it; I desire to know EVERYTHING." The contents were very painful for Josephine's heart, as many passages related to the King of Rome and to Maria Louisa.

"What do you think of that woman?" said the Empress Josephine, looking at me with a remarkable expression. "I, Madame! What I have always thought—that such a woman should never have crossed the frontiers of France; I say so from the bottom of my heart." "Indeed!" said Josephine, fixing on me her eyes bathed in tears, but smiling at the idea that I shared her opinion.

I repeated the expression, adding that I did so not to gratify the Empress Josephine, but because such was my belief. And I think so still, at the present day, after the lapse of twenty-two years. "Madame Junot," said the Empress Josephine, "I have a great mind to write to Napoleon. Would you know the reason? I wish he would permit my accompanying him to the island of Elba, if Maria Louisa should keep away. Do you think she will follow him?" "Quite the contrary; she is incapable of doing so." "But if the Emperor of Austria should send to Napoleon his wife and child, as indeed he ought to do?" [Josephine, it may be seen, was not much skilled in politics.] "I am very anxious to know whether that will be the case; and you, Madame Junot," she always called me thus, "may be useful to me in this emergency." "How so, Madame?" "By putting the question to M. de Metternich; he is a friend of yours; you often see him; nothing can be more easy than to ask him."

"Your Majesty is quite mistaken. M. de Metternich is no doubt a great friend of mine; I often see him; but when he arrived at Paris he told me that if he called to take in my society a short relaxation from the fatigue of his occupations, he entreated that I would never speak to him again upon matters respecting which he could not even give me a reply. In a word, he made me promise I should never talk politics with him."

The Empress did not seem displeased at my refusal; she was kind-hearted, and knew how incapable I was of refusing her through any unkind motive. She merely shed tears, and said that my grounds of objection were a fresh source of sorrow to her. "I am beset with misfortunes," added she, bursting again into tears. I then observed to her that the Emperor's consent that she should go to the island of Elba was more than doubtful. She seemed astonished. "Why should he refuse it?"

"Because his sisters will assuredly go there, as well as Madame Mère. Let your Majesty recollect all you have suffered when seated on the Throne of France, in the Imperial Palace of the Tuileries, when strong in the title of the Emperor's consort; if, when you were Sovereign, Madame, the Emperor's sisters could disturb your repose, what might they not do at the present day?"

The Empress fell into deep meditation, a circumstance of rare occurrence. "I think you are in the right," she at last said to me—"I think you are in the right." She remained for some time with her head resting upon her hand. On a sudden she raised it, and said to me: "Have you seen the Comte d'Artois?" "No, Madame." "You have, then, never heard anything said respecting me?"

"Absolutely nothing." "Madame Junot, you are deceiving me." "I assure your Majesty, on my word of honor, that I am not." "I hear that it is intended to deprive me of the title of Majesty, and to compel me to assume the name and title of Duchesse de Navarre." I repeated my assertion that I knew nothing whatever.

The ruling desire in Josephine's mind at this moment was to retain the title of MAJESTY; I even think she had already made this request to the Emperor of Russia, though she assured me she had not yet mentioned the subject to him. She was greatly agitated; her face was scarlet, and I could perceive that the various recent occurrences had made a deep impression upon her.

It is well known that she had become very corpulent; she had lost her slender figure; her features were altered; she was divested of that elegance which had once made her the most fascinating woman of Paris and of her Court. All that was left to her was a dignified deportment and great elegance of manners, and especially of dress. The last was always an important point with her.

It was very late when I left Malmaison for Paris, and I did not reach home until nearly six o'clock. I found another letter, which announced Napoleon's departure as fixed for the following day; but a circumstance which would have been painful to the Empress Josephine had she known it was that, on the same day on which she delighted in recalling to her mind the visit of the Emperor of Russia, he had gone with the Emperor of Austria to dine with Maria Louisa at Rambouillet. I learned this on my return. Maria Louisa appeared resigned and indifferent to her fate; Madame de Montesquieu was to accompany her in order not to quit her pupil—happily, as we hoped, for the future prospects of France.

What were Napoleon's feelings on reading the act of adhesion, the proclamation of Marshal Augereau? of a man who had never forgiven him the Bridge of Arcola, and who now in his proclamation to his soldiers had the audacity to pen and to commit to the press—to his eternal shame—a phrase so insulting to the nation itself?

After admitting that Louis XVIII. was the beloved Sovereign wished for in the secret aspirations of AUGEREAU himself, he added: "Soldiers, you are released from your oaths by the very abdication of a man who, after having sacrificed millions of victims to his cruel ambition, had not the courage to die the death of a soldier."

What must Napoleon not have felt on learning that Ney had given a magnificent breakfast to the Emperor of Russia, and that he wept at the kindness of his Royal guest!

All was anxiety at the Tuileries until the Emperor should have quitted France. It was not enough that he should have fallen—he must be crushed; his removal was no security—they longed for his death. At last he took his departure. The immortal picture of Horace Vernet, which represents Napoleon quitting his faithful Guards in the Court of the Palace, renders superfluous all description of this scene.*

The Emperor quitted Fontainebleau on the 20th of April, escorted, like a prisoner, by Commissioners from all the Allied Powers. England was represented by Colonel Campbell, Russia by General Schuwaloff, Austria by General Köller, Prussia by M. de Schack, and France by I know not whom; the escort of foreign troops amounted to fifteen hundred men.

The 20th of April, then, was the day that the Emperor quitted Fontainebleau, which he was to revisit on the 20th of March following. The suite of the Emperor was too considerable, and the escort too numerous, to allow of rapid traveling; he had only reached Montargis late on the same day. General Bertrand was alone with the Emperor in his carriage. On that morning piquets of cavalry and escorts had reconnoitered the road. Well-founded fears were entertained of a rescue. Had the Emperor uttered a word a civil war would have been kindled, and perhaps not twenty thousand of the Allied troops would have escaped out of France.

Napoleon's carriage was drawn by six horses; it was immediately followed by a special troop of cavalry, con-

*When the Emperor passed in review, in the great Court of the Palace, the troops that had been faithful, and whose headquarters were at Fontainebleau, he was, as may be supposed, very much affected. He said to the officer who carried the colors: "As I cannot take leave personally of all my friends who surround me at this moment, I embrace these colors, and bid them an eternal adieu."

sisting of twenty-five men; then came the generals, the French, Prussian, Austrian, Russian, and English commissioners, with their long train of carriages, also drawn by six horses. The Emperor's baggage followed, but not sufficient to fill sixty carriages, as it has been asserted in many newspapers. They amounted to twenty at most—a remarkable circumstance was that a part of the Guard was cantoned in the country, and under arms; but they had been enjoined, many days before, not to give the slightest indication of pity toward their fallen master. The least movement might have occasioned his death! The Guard maintained a profound silence; it was dejected and broken in spirits.

The Emperor was calm and serene. He bowed with that smile so peculiar to him, and which so brightened his countenance. He perhaps showed himself a greater man on that day than at moments when he stood before the admiring world. He was then surrounded by a devoted body of men,—the least wave of his hand, and thousands of swords would have been drawn from their scabbards. But he suppressed every feeling. On the night of Napoleon's passing Montargis he slept at the Castle of Briare; this was the 23d of April. He then continued his journey toward Saint Tropez and Orgon.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

Arrival of the Duc de Berri—Reception of Louis XVIII. in London—The Comte d'Artois—Madame de Lawestine—The Duc de Berri—Louis XVIII.—Dangerous Excess of Joy—The Duc de Berri at Bayeux.

BUT I must now bestow attention on the events which were taking place at Paris under my own eyes, and engrossing the public mind. The day on which Napoleon quitted the Castle of Fontainebleau as a prisoner, the Duc de Berri arrived at Paris, and Louis XVIII. made that royal entrance into London which he had assuredly never meditated in his most sanguine dreams.

Louis XVIII. at his return to France was only known to us by a doubtful tradition, and there was nothing to his advantage in the accounts we received of him. The Comte d'Artois was also, to France, a new personage. "The Comte d'Artois," said the Duc de Mouchy, M. de Laigle, and a crowd of our fashionables of the period intervening before the Revolution of 1814, "is a delightful man; he is elegance itself; a charming prince, and will be the very oracle of fashion!" Next followed a long account of all the hearts which the Comte d'Artois had immolated, a detail of overpowering interest respecting the importance of Madame de Polignac, the despair of Madame de Gontaut. In short, there was really something to expect from a prince who, while breaking every heart, could spread so much happiness.

It was in the midst of a conversation which chanced to dwell on the friendships of the Comte d'Artois that two persons who knew him well gave me an insight into his true character. The illusion immediately vanished—nothing was left to admire in him except his good nature; we might add to it the most accomplished manners, and even a species of worldly wit which might be worthy of admiration in 1780, but which in 1814, and especially in 1830, nearly caused the ruin of France.

The Duc de Berri was called the descendant of Henri IV. Poor Henri IV.! he is ever at hand to be used as a comparison. This adulation was distributed with due reference to the peculiarity of disposition. The Duc d'Angoulême descended from Saint Louis because of his devotion; the Duc de Berri from Henri IV. because of his worldly passions; and the Comte d'Artois from Francis I. because he had been a man of consummate gallantry five-and-twenty years before. How amusing!

With respect to Louis XVIII., he was really a superior man. His ideas, when he first arrived in France, were framed upon a comprehensive scale, and rested upon a broad foundation—witness the constitutional charter. In Louis XVIII. I found a man of capacity, of profound wisdom, and of a deep knowledge of men. I have often been closeted with him in a private audience. On one occasion, in particular, I remained with him for three-quarters of an hour, and have assuredly never repented paying close attention to his words. Nothing was to be lost of his conversation. He spoke with consummate talent, and could read the characters of men.

he was devoid of every kind feeling, if we are to judge from the opinions of those who were about him, and to believe in the sincerity of such a circle. Louis XVIII. was deeply learned. Like all princes, he was gifted with an extraordinary memory; to AFFECTION he was not insensible; but he was a stranger to any deep, settled friendship.

When Louis XVIII. heard the news that the Crown of France was DECREED to him he was well-nigh yielding it up. He felt such a revolution within him that he fainted away, and was for a short time seriously ill from excess of joy. This particular was made known to me by a person who had long resided near Hartwell. It was perhaps deemed conducive to the dignity of Louis XVIII. to conceal this fact, which is nevertheless incontrovertible.

The new position of the King of France no sooner became known than the deportment of the Prince Regent of England toward him altered on a sudden; for, in spite of all that has been said to the contrary, his royal demeanor in his intercourse with a brother Sovereign was more than familiar, a circumstance which I learned from those who had assuredly no interest in perverting the truth.

A singular coincidence appeared in the following circumstance: The same day on which Napoleon quitted Fontainebleau to commence his exile, Louis XVIII. made his entry into London as King of France, namely, on the 20th of April. I had then many friends in London, and they apprised me of all that passed at that epoch.

The reception of the King was not one of the least curious circumstances of the day. I received the following details:

Louis XVIII. left Hartwell on the morning of the 20th of April, 1814, and breakfasted at Stanmore, where the Prince Regent met him. From thence to London the road was crowded, the English all wearing white ribbons and laurel wreaths. One can understand the former as complimentary to the Bourbons; but the laurels, were they worn in token of having vanquished the French?

Louis XVIII. wore on this occasion the uniform of a French marshal, which, with his velvet boots, could not have looked quite consistent. The Prince Regent wore a Court suit, and, in common with all his followers, a white cockade. At a quarter before six P. M. the cavalcade reached Albemarle Street, where everything was prepared for the reception of his Majesty at Grillon's Hotel. Next day the King received almost all the city of London. Doubtless, the genuine enthusiasm was very great; but all who know the English character are aware that éclat is the mode with them. It is sufficient to TALK of anyone, and everybody thinks himself bound to run to see the wonder. The number of carriages that thronged Albemarle Street during the whole of the 21st of April is almost incredible. In the evening the King followed the Duchesse d'Angoulême, who had gone to visit the Queen of England. His carriage was drawn by six horses, decorated with numerous bows of white ribbon. The English are, in general, extremely fond of using gewgaws to testify their joy.

At half-past six o'clock the King of France entered the court of Carlton House. The guard was commanded by Colonel Mercer, a distinguished officer, whom I knew indirectly, being intimately connected with one of his relations. The music struck up "God Save the King," which was followed by poor "Henri Quatre," who thus made a prelude in London to his long and brilliant career in France during 1814 and 1815. The Prince de Condé and the Duc de Bourbon accompanied his Majesty. On his approach the guard presented arms, and the Regent hastened to receive the guest, who, from his pensioner, had become his ally. The monarchs shook hands, and forthwith the air resounded with huzzas. Giving his arm to the King, his Royal Highness, although, now grown corpulent, and no longer entitled to the merited appellation of the finest man in England,—where fine men are so numerous,—still presented, I am told, an air and figure of striking elegance. The King having been conducted into a suitable apartment, a Chapter was held of the Order of the Garter, at which His Majesty was proposed as a knight. Being duly elected, the Dukes of York and Kent introduced the novice. He entered the hall of the Chapter with a step sufficiently firm for a King who could not walk. Kneeling on a velvet cushion, the Regent gave him the customary accolade, and tied on the Garter with his own hands.

In exchange for the Garter, Louis XVIII. gave his blue cordon to the Duke of York. One thing was odd enough—namely, that Louis XVIII. had not already possessed the Order of the Garter, for he had been King of France a long time; but, then, he had been a fugitive and unhappy King.

On the 22d the Lord Mayor and the sheriffs of the city of London waited on the King to offer their congratulations; and then followed a crowd of deputations from French towns, each of which was fearful of arriving too late. The town of Dunkirk, among others, was desirous of first engrossing Louis XVIII.; and, instead of awaiting him quietly in its corner, dispatched its good citizens to seek their King in a foreign land.

The Prince Regent accompanied his royal ally to Dover, where the latter embarked on board a vessel commanded by the Duke of Clarence. General Girard had been dispatched to Hartwell to receive the orders of the King. The different marshals awaited him on the seashore, or I know not where else. In short, fifteen days only after the departure of Napoleon for Elba that great man was almost wholly forgotten by those who should religiously have treasured his memory.

The delight of the people of England at these events amounted to a delirium. Posterity, who will coolly judge of all that passed, will understand the full extent of the danger of Great Britain as developed by the Saturnalian manifestations of joy universal throughout the capital. "They must have been in great fear," says some writer or other, "to have made a vow to erect such a wonder as the Escorial;" and, in like manner, I say that the English must have been in dire peril to evince so much exultation at the fall of their enemy. The whole Metropolis was illuminated; and at Carlton House a transparency was exhibited, representing the arms and crown of France, supported by Victory and Renown. Underneath was inscribed: "Louis XVIII.! Vive les Bourbons!"

A regiment was in garrison in the environs of Bayeux. The Duc de Berri, passing through that city, was told that this regiment was very ill affected toward the House of Bourbon, and felt desirous of personally ascertaining the fact. The Prince played a showy part in this affair; his conduct was brave, and loyal, and worthy, for the occasion, of Henri Quatre. Arrived near the regiment, he demanded the Colonel's horses, under what pretext I know not. The Colonel hastened to send them, and appeared himself before the adventurous Prince, who asked him:

"Where is your regiment?"

The Colonel offered to conduct his Highness, if he were desirous to see the soldiers. The Duke accepted the offer. The troop was under arms.

"Soldiers," said the Prince, "you know me not yet; but we shall soon grow acquainted. I am the Duc de Berri, nephew of Louis XVIII., the King whom France has recognized. Will you join with me? Come, then; cry 'Vive le Roi!'"

The entire regiment joined in this exclamation, one voice alone shouting "Vive l'Empereur!"—ONE voice alone. And Napoleon had abdicated but ten days.

Hearing this single cry, the Duke smiled, and said: "It is but the remains of an old custom—once more!"

And the man cried: "Vive le Roi!"

The papers of the day (and all of them repeated the story) said that the second time the cry was unanimous.

The Duke, who, as we hinted, played the principal part in the piece, ordered an extraordinary distribution to the troop. He did well in giving; did they do so in receiving this bounty?

"Upon THIS," continued the journals, "the acclamations were enthusiastic, and the whole regiment requested permission to take the name of Berri."

The Duke was, in fact, a man, who, had he lived, would have been of great service in supporting the Bourbon family. His assassin, in striking HIM, knew well what he did; he attacked the tree at its roots.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

Cardinal Maury's Mysterious Visit — Scene in the Archiepiscopal Chapel.

CARDINAL MAURY wrote one day requesting to see me, but expressed a great wish for secrecy. "I entreat," said he in his letter, "that nobody may know of your visit. This is the reason why I do not come to you." I was astonished at this air of mystery.

Nevertheless, I complied with the Cardinal's desire; and arriving at the great gate of Nôtre Dame, I went into the church, and after performing my devotions went out by the little red door, and entered the Archiepiscopal precincts, where the Cardinal lodged before his departure for Italy. His Eminence awaited me in the chapel, whither I was conducted by his valet de chambre. I confess that this mystery and these precautions amused me infinitely.

The Archiepiscopal chapel, which had been constructed by Cardinal Fesch during his short Episcopacy, was very peculiar in form; its situation in the garden, surrounded by flowers, gave it an aspect always very touching to me when I have attended divine service therein. I knelt down on entering and said a prayer; I then advanced toward the Cardinal, who, seated on one of the armchairs which stood before the balustrade, seemed either praying or reflecting. His countenance was peculiar: he gazed on me, but made no motion even for me to advance; I felt some trepidation. I, however, went to him.

"Your Eminence has desired to see me," said I; "I attend your orders." He started, gazed on me anew, and then said: "You are kind to come. But I knew you would. You know how to be the friend of those who are no longer fortunate. Is it not so?" His large forehead contracted, while his little eyes glared in their orbits, and his voice became tremulous. "Will you serve me?" said he at length, fixing on me an earnest glance. "Undoubtedly, if I can. But my influence is very slight. In what can I be of use to you?" "You might save me!" said he in a low voice, looking meanwhile round the chapel like a man who dreads to encounter a spy. "Save you, Monseigneur?" "Yes; listen to me. I am certain that at Rome they want to impose on me a severe penance. They will perhaps seek to shut me up in a cloister; but I will not go there. No! by all the fiends," cried he, forgetting his caution, "they shall not have me living! I will fear Consalvi no more than I did that silly Duc d'Aiguillon." He was red as his cassock, and appeared beside himself. I regarded him with astonishment, and did not see in what way I could be useful to him. He soon told me.

"This Court of Rome, which imagines itself of some consequence because the Pope is recognized by schismatical and Protestant Sovereigns, fancies it can still act as it did at the time when the IMBECILES condemned Galileo. But they are deceived; and I will adopt the guise of a schismatic in order to laugh at them. You must obtain me an audience of the Emperor of Russia." I stood aghast. "You will not?" "I did not say that, Monseigneur. But your Eminence should reflect a moment ere you invoke the aid of a Prince who is not of the Catholic communion. I do not think it can be done with proper dignity." The Cardinal regarded me with concentrated rage. He would have crushed me if he had dared. He rose, traversed the chapel for some time, and then again approached me.

"You censure me, then?" said he. "No, sir; but I confess I should grieve at taking a message from you to the Emperor of Russia." "Diable! diable!" repeated he, pacing the floor again, and occasionally taking a large pinch of Spanish snuff from the pocket of his undervest. Suddenly he stopped; then coming up to me once more, he said, with that voice of thunder known to belong to him: "But, nevertheless, you are my friend. How can you see me depart for Rome without having fears for my life?" "Oh, Monseigneur!"

"I know well that they will not poison me like Zizim. I know well that they will not roast me before a slow fire; but they will probably incarcerate me in the monastery of Albano, or in a convent situated in the most savage mountains of the Apennines. And once there, what would become of me? And all because I have obeyed him whom Pius VII. consecrated, anointed, crowned with his own hand! And this Consalvi!"

He smote his forehead with his hand, powdering his face in the most whimsical-looking manner imaginable with his snuff.

"Monseigneur, your fears are, I am sure, without foundation. But, even admitting them, what can I do in the matter?" "Well, speak to Metternich! He is Catholic, apostolic, and Roman, and, I think, would not willingly see me ill treated." "That I will do with pleasure," answered I. "I am confident M. de Metternich will do his utmost to serve your Eminence, and I will speak to him this very day. But, after all, what am I to say? for I cannot tell him that the Holy Father means to kill your Eminence, or transform you into a lay brother, for he would not listen to me." "And why not?" demanded he, in an eager tone.

"Why, Monseigneur? Because the Pope is the most perfect human being in Rome. He is an angel and a saint. Your Eminence is misinformed if you have fears of him; neither is Cardinal Consalvi capable of so much treachery." "Really!" rejoined he, with an expression I had never witnessed in him before. "Ah! you pretend to know all the gang better than I? Well, be it so. But meanwhile, I take care of my skin." (I quote the Cardinal's own phrase.) "If you object to introducing me to your friends from the fear of compromising yourself, you are at liberty not to do so."

Hearing the Cardinal's last speech I became offended, rose, and walked toward the door. "I have the honor," said I, "to observe to your Eminence that I am disposed to execute every commission you may give me; but I cannot suffer friendship to carry me so far as to become ridiculous. When you can make use of my services, I am at your command." I was about to retire, when he came to me, took me by the hand, and seated me in an arm-chair.

"The Emperor," said he, "might well say that you had a head of iron." "He might have added," returned I, "that with this head of iron I have a woman's heart to serve those I love. This is perhaps better than where there is a head more pliable and a less feeling heart." "Hem! I know that you are right, and perhaps it is as you say: I know that Metternich must not be told that the Pope and Consalvi mean to act falsely; but he may be led to understand as much." "I cannot speak of Cardinal Consalvi in this matter without evil, and I esteem him too much to——"

"Ah! you were going to tell me that you also esteem La Somaglia, Spada, and Pacca! Oh, that Cardinal Pacca!" "But, Monseigneur, I know nothing against Consalvi; why, therefore, should I speak ill of him?" "But I know, and I direct you to speak." "That will not suffice, Monseigneur. Your Eminence is irritated, and not master of yourself. At this moment I must not hear you." The Cardinal looked as if he could beat me; but he perhaps thought better of it. He ascended or rather jumped up the two steps of the sanctuary, disappeared through the little door which was to the left of the altar, and gained the private staircase which led to his apartment.

After his departure I remained some time expecting he would return. I pitied his folly, but was resolved not to cede my point. He came not, nor did he send anyone. After waiting a quarter of an hour, I went to my carriage and drove home.

The same evening I related the conversation to my uncle, the Abbé Comnena, whose virtues and intelligence were to me the surest guide. He applauded my conduct, assuring me he would have done the same in my place. From this moment I felt at ease, particularly as Albert, to whom I also mentioned the affair, coincided in opinion with my uncle. I thus felt that I had not erred in apparently refusing to serve a friend, but in reality declining to second a vengeance ill conceived, even in the interest of the person who desired to consummate it.

The next day the Cardinal wrote me a strange letter, wherein he begged pardon for the conversation of the previous day, asking me to forget, and, above all, not to mention it. He told me likewise that he was about to depart for Italy, and would come to bid me farewell. I replied that I should be delighted to see him; that I advised him to write to Metternich, and place entire confidence in him. With respect to mentioning our inter-

WHILE Louis XVIII. was advancing toward the throne of Clovis, Paris testified the same joy which it had before then exhibited on so many opposite occasions. At this time Napoleon, still in the midst of his enemies, received a short but most extraordinary letter, which was put into his hands at Montélimart. He immediately entered into conversation with the postmaster, and asked him if he was the master of the house. "Yes, Sire." "How far do you reckon it from hence to Avignon?" "Eight hours' journey, if your Majesty be well driven, but the roads are bad."

Napoleon walked about musing. "Eight hours!" at length he said, "and now it is——" "Twenty minutes to seven, Sire," replied General Bertrand; "your Majesty should set out again at ten." "Let the horses be put to at nine," said Napoleon; and, continuing his walk, he appeared to be calculating how long his journey would take him. "I shall arrive at six o'clock in the morning," continued he; "these natives of Avignon were always hot-headed. Well," pursued he, "we must warn the commissioners of the Allied Powers. We will change horses outside the town."

At this time several of the public officers of the commune of Montélimart were introduced to the Emperor. He conversed with them for some moments with a calmness most remarkable at such a time, when the question of his own life or death was being agitated around him. When these officers spoke to him of their regrets, he replied in these words, replete with wisdom and firmness,* "Gentlemen, act like me: be resigned."

The troops in the city, when they saw him getting into the carriage, cried out enthusiastically, "Vive l'Empereur!" Two stages further on, at Donzène, he was met by cries of vengeance. The inhabitants were celebrating a fête for the arrival of the King in Paris, and the sight of the Emperor roused their indignation. He looked out upon the women, who, like furies, were shouting and uttering invectives against him: it was a shocking spectacle.

On his arrival at Orgon he was convinced that his fears were well founded.† In proportion as he removed from Paris and entered Provence, Napoleon observed gloomy countenances and armed hands. Mothers demanded their children, and widows their husbands. There was a terrible eloquence in these cries, wrung from the wretched people; but was it right to overwhelm him who was as wretched as they?

At Avignon the danger which had been secretly threatening the travelers since leaving Valence broke out with a fury which alarmed the commissioners of the Allies. Napoleon was always calm and remarkably unconcerned, while all around him were inspired with an ardor which perhaps had not him alone for its object.‡ Already for

* Would it be believed that the spirit of party has endeavored to cast a censure upon this affecting reply?

† At Orgon the Emperor ran a risk of his life, and only owed his safety to the lucky thought of passing for one of the suite of the commissioners. He was to stop at the Hôtel Royale, to which there were two entrances; and while the Emperor was conversing with the master of the house, preparations were made for his departure by one of these.

‡ As Napoleon approached Avignon he found the populace ripe for disorder; and as he advanced more toward the south of France violence and danger increased. Everyone knows that this part of the French Empire is of all others the most blind instrument in all great movements and political reactions. Religious and revolu-

some days, since the arrival of Napoleon had been announced, the tumult in the city had been terrible, and the National Guard was wholly occupied in quieting the people.

On Sunday, the 23d of April, coaches, and carriages with the Imperial arms, arrived at the posthouse—that same house which was shortly afterward to serve as the scaffold of a virtuous man*. A popular disturbance ensued, and was only allayed by the Emperor's suite who were in these carriages assuming the white cascade. The riot lasted during the greater part of the day; but at last, weary of waiting, the crowd separated.

On Monday, the 24th of April, Colonel Campbell, the commissioner of England, arrived at Avignon at four o'clock in the morning. The officer at the gate through which Napoleon was to enter anxiously inquired of Colonel Campbell if the Emperor's escort were sufficient to make a strong resistance in the event of an attack.

tionary madness have both successively been blotted there. The people of that lovely country have danced round the scaffold of terror, and a year later they massacred the Terrorists confined in the fortress of Saint Jean. After having assassinated Marshal Bessières at Avignon, the people saluted with outrage and with menace their beloved Emperor. The most ignoble epithets were hurled at him, accompanied with ribald verses, in which his name appeared in every line. A single fact that occurred at this moment will speak more volumes than the historian can write. On leaving a small inn where he had passed the night, he was walking toward his carriage to proceed to Fréjus, when a lady, who was mixed in the mob that was vociferating "Down with Nicholas!" addressed herself to Napoleon, believing him to be one of the suite, and begged him to point out Nicholas to her. "I am Nicholas," replied he with dignity. "You are jesting," said the lady. "Nicholas has not so benevolent a countenance as you have, and, besides, he is a greater man than you." "Oh!" rejoined the Emperor, "I understand you suppose that Nicholas has the stature of a giant and the face of an ogre." Napoleon drew from his pocket several pieces of gold, and desired her to compare the likenesses. The lady examined the profile with confusion and surprise, while the Emperor told her to distribute the money among the mob of the place, as a gift on the part of Nicholas. It may not be generally known that the name "Nicholas" in the French language is an opprobrious term, and is often applied to those who, either from want of reason, common sense, or reflection, hope to succeed in some rash or mad-brained exploit. (Compare also Napoleon's use of this name in reference to Scott when in Portugal.)

"Do you really fear any attempt?" asked the Colonel. The officer replied in the affirmative. The Colonel then appeared uneasy, and in consequence of this intelligence, and from what he himself witnessed, he ordered the post-horses to be taken to the city gate opposite to that through which the Emperor was to enter, and sent an express that the escort should direct its course thither.

But he could not give his orders so secretly as to escape the notice of the townspeople, and a furious crowd surrounded the Imperial carriage as soon as it appeared. The officer, whose conduct was so honorable to him, and whose name I regret much to be unable to give, was unavoidably absent from this newly-appointed place when Napoleon arrived there, and when he came up the carriage was entirely surrounded by an angry mob, and a drunken man, brandishing an old saber, had already his hand on the door of the Emperor's carriage, uttering frightful imprecations.

On a movement that indicated the design on the part of the ruffian, a footman of the Emperor, named François, who was seated on the outside, drew his sword. "Remain quiet," exclaimed the officer, and at the same instant the Emperor rapidly let down the front glass and said in a loud and commanding tone, "François, remain still, I command you." By this time the horses were put to, and the carriage started. As soon as he felt himself in motion the Emperor bowed to the officer, and, smiling, thanked him very cordially.

General Schuwaloff, the commissioner from Russia, General Köller, and Colonel Campbell, behaved admirably in this affair. There were two others of whom I cannot say the same—I will not name them. It has been said that the Prussian commissioner harangued the people, exhorting them "to let the tyrant live that he might be punished by repentance and regrets, which would inflict upon him a thousand deaths." This bad taste in the foreign commissioner did not escape Napoleon, who, smiling ironically, said, "In truth, General, you speak French admirably."

Much has been said of several proposals made to the King and to Monsieur to assassinate Napoleon, and of the constant refusal of the King. I will believe this, as also the innocence of M. de Talleyrand in this affair. I nevertheless recollect that, under Louis XIV., the Marquis de Louville wrote to the Duc de Beauvilliers and to M. de Torcy, all three considered among the most virtuous men of their age: "Let the handsome Amirant of Castile be pursued, and let him be killed wherever he may be, and no matter in what way." However chivalrous the loyalty and piety of M. de Blacas may be, it is not more so than that of M. de Louville; and therefore I have a right to suspect that a blow, the most important in its results, was intended to have been struck at Orgon. Emissaries were sent into this town; the Emperor was expected there. The famous Vincent, the town butcher, and one of the murderers of La Glacière, was at the head of two hundred wretches who were shouting that they would have the blood of the Emperor, of the Tyrant, of the Corsican.

Napoleon was aware, from the time of his arrival at Montélimart, of the danger which he would run at Orgon and at Fréjus. Life had now become a burden to him; but to lose it by the dagger of the assassin, yet streaming with the blood of women and aged priests, was abhorrent to his feelings. General Köller and the other commissioners were informed by him of what was about to take place. They received the communication as honorable men might be expected to do.

The Emperor arrived at Orgon in the first carriage; he was with General Köller. But how was he to escape recognition from eyes that found his portrait on the smallest coin? The posthouse at Orgon had a courtyard with a gate at each extremity. Between these the carriage of the Emperor halted; a figure clothed like him was suspended to a rope and swung about in the air, accompanied by the shouts of the whole crowd thirsting for his blood.

The postmaster and mistress of Orgon wished to protect the travelers, whoever they might be, from the dangers which threatened them. They therefore closed the gate toward the disturbed portion of the town, and hastened the postilions. It is known how this gate was shattered beneath the blows of this butcher himself, encouraged by a gentleman, said to be of the neighborhood,

An excitement was thus kept up among them, and the hatred of the women especially was aroused by the recollection of the losses they had sustained in the Emperor's wars. "I lost two of my sons at Mojaisk," cried one. "I lost my husband and my father at Wagram," said her companion. "And I," exclaimed a man with a wooden leg, "have been thus mutilated since I was twenty." "And the taxes," cried another, "are they not disgraceful—and a jug of wine to cost threepence, and all to support his BUTCHERIES, which he calls wars—death to the tyrant!"

These cries assumed every moment a more serious character. What happened a few weeks later at Avignon has shown the horrors that might have been committed at Orgon. The Emperor appears to have escaped this extreme danger by disguising himself in a traveling coat of General Köller.

Other accounts attribute his preservation to a female servant at the inn. This woman had resolved to strike the first blow at the Emperor, but when she saw him before her, stripped of his power and overwhelmed by misfortune, her feeling toward him relented, and she exerted herself for his preservation. She cried out to the mob with a loud voice: "Stand by and let the commissioners pass who are going to embark the tyrant."

The following anecdote of the Emperor on his way to Elba also ought not to be omitted: A little on the north of Lyons, at La Tour, the Emperor supped alone (he was not in the habit of supping with the Allied Commissioners); his meal was soon over, and, as the night was fine, he went out and walked in the road. A respectable ecclesiastic followed at the same time to speak with him.

Napoleon was singing in a low tone (he is known to have had a very bad voice), and the air that the priest recognized was, O Richard! O mon Roi! He sang for some time; at length he stopped, leaned against a tree, and looked up to heaven. He remained some time contemplating a star, and then resumed his lonely walk. The priest now placed himself opposite to him, and Napoleon started on seeing a man so near.

Saluces, one of her ladies, and M. le Comte de Montbretton, her principal equerry.

At two in the afternoon of the 26th of April the Emperor's arrival was announced. M. de Montbretton hastened into the hall to meet him, when a person unknown to the Count leaped hastily from the carriage and inquired for the Princess. It was the Emperor, but so disguised that it was impossible to recognize him. He knew M. de Montbretton well, and said: "These poor wretches would have murdered me—I have escaped only by means of this disguise." "Your Majesty has done well," replied the Count.

At this moment they entered the chamber of the Princess. She extended her arms to him and burst into tears. All at once her attention was arrested by the Austrian uniform which he wore, and she turned pale. "How is this?" she asked. "Why this uniform?" "Pauline," replied Napoleon, "do you wish me dead?" The Princess, looking at him steadfastly, replied: "I cannot embrace you in that dress—O Napoleon, what have you done?"

The Emperor immediately retired, and having substituted for the Austrian the uniform of one of the Old Guard, entered the chamber of his sister, who ran to him and embraced him with a tenderness which drew tears from the eyes of all present. Napoleon himself was much affected. These emotions, however, were but of short duration. He approached the window and looked into the little court beneath, which was filled with a crowd of persons, for the most part as much exasperated against him as those of Orgon, or Fréjus, and of Avignon.

Napoleon, profiting by a momentary calm which appeared to have fallen upon them, descended into this very small courtyard, in which were four or five hundred persons. He had on his three-cornered hat, and the coat of the Imperial Guard, the rest of his dress being the same as that in which the soldiers had always seen him.

The commissioners, when they saw him in the midst of these peasants, became alarmed, and General Köller respectfully reminded him that until his arrival at Porto Ferrajo they were answerable for his safety. "To

"Who are you?" he asked. "I am an ecclesiastic, Sire, and rector of this commune." "Have you been so long?" "Since its formation—since your Majesty restored religion to France" (and the worthy priest bowed to the Emperor. All are not ungrateful!). Napoleon walked on for some time in silence: "Has this village suffered much?" "Greatly, Sire; its burdens were too heavy."

The Emperor pursued his way; at length, stopping suddenly, he looked up to the sky, and inquired the name of a certain star. The priest being unable to inform him, he said: "Once I knew the names of all these stars—and of my own; but now——" He was silent for a short space, and then resumed: "Yes, now I forget everything." They were now approaching the house; the Emperor took some gold from his pocket, and, giving it to the priest, said: "I cannot do more; but the humble are great in the eyes of God. Pray for me, and mine alms will bring forth fruit." "Sire!"

The mode of uttering this single word probably expressed much, for the Emperor started when he heard it, and replied: "Yes, perhaps you are right—perhaps I was too fond of war; but it is too serious a question," said he, smiling, "to be discussed on the highway. Once more adieu! Pray for me!"

I have already remarked that Lyons was on the point of rising in his favor, and that he was hurried through that city by night. It is certain that he was for a long time in fear of his life, and that it was only when in sight of the Mediterranean that his spirits recovered their wonted elasticity.

One consolation was afforded to him under these painful circumstances. His sister, the Princess Pauline, after having passed the winter at Nice and Hyères, had hired a small country house, where she was awaiting the final issue of events in the greatest anxiety. She was informed that her brother was approaching, and that his life was threatened. She knew the disposition of the country; and when she heard that the Emperor was but a few leagues distant she was in the greatest alarm. The mad cries of the populace were heard even beneath the windows of the house in which the Princess was living with no other attendants than Madame la Marquise de simple words, "Sire, the Princess would speak to you without witnesses," hastened to OBEY.

The Emperor remained a day and a half with his sister, and then took the road to Porto Ferrajo, to reign over fruits and fields, which subsequently were changed to fetters and a barren rock.

The Russian, English, and Prussian commissioners left him at Saint Euphemia, where he embarked for Porto Ferrajo. General Köller was the only one who accompanied him to Elba (unless Colonel Campbell was also with him).

CHAPTER XL.

Anglomaniæ—A Stroke of the Pen—Fête of Prince Schwartzberg at Saint Cloud—The Comédie Française—The Polonaise—Œdipe—Maubrueil and Talleyrand, and the Robbery of the Diamonds of the Queen of Westphalia—Maria Louisa—The Ices of the Duc de Berri—The Grenadier.

WHILE the Exile was thus traveling toward his prison, the new King of France made his entry into Paris. He arrived from London in an English dress, with an English hat, and an ENGLISH white cockade that the Prince Regent himself had fastened in; and nature decreed that the change should be complete; the new King was unable to walk, as he then labored under a fit of the gout; he wore velvet boots, and appeared in powder; he was the representative of the good old men of 1789.

The Charter was granted, and we ought to have been satisfied with it. Indeed, it was an excellent one, and had it been adhered to we should have had no reason to complain. When Napoleon read it he exclaimed: "This one stroke of the pen has done in an instant what I have been endeavoring to do for the last twenty years." This was very complimentary, and I believe he felt it to be true.

Prince Schwartzberg gave a splendid fête at the Palace of Saint Cloud, in which he was then living. The period of my mourning had not yet expired, and that

onfused buzz was heard, and the commissioners, tly alarmed, entreated him to return into the house;
this was the sort of danger that delighted him.

While he was in the crowd he noticed in a corner of courtyard a man about fifty years old, with a gash ss his nose and a red ribbon in his buttonhole.

The Emperor perceived that this man was looking at and, returning his gaze, appeared to be endeavor-to recollect his name. All at once he smiled, and, oaching him, said: "Are you not Jacques Dumont?"

The man could not immediately reply, but at length he soldier drew himself up, and put his hand to his head as if to give the military salute.

You were wounded, but that seems to me very long now, whenever the drum beats, I feel like a de-man shed tears as he said: "My name! to recollect name at the end of fifteen years." The Emperor on issing him presented him with a cross.

Napoleon having expressed a desire to communicate Marshal Masséna, at that time in command at Toulon, greatest eagerness was displayed among the crowd onvey his letter. "I will go!" exclaimed two hundred voices at once, in a delirium of enthusiasm. "Let e I," cried a woman, "for the Emperor knew my band—'twas he who gave him his horse that he ht better pursue those Austrians in Italy."

At this moment General Köller approached M. de atbreton. "How shall we induce his Majesty to reinto the house?" said the General; "I would not say thing unpleasant, nevertheless——" The Count unstood the General's meaning, and ten minutes after-d the Princess Borghèse sent for her brother.
Napoleon, restored to a sense of his situation by these occasion, as it contained passages that would bear a disagreeable interpretation.

Between the acts the orchestra played Vive Henri Quatre which air was introduced three times more in the course of the ballet.

The Duchesse d'Angoulême was condescending, but appeared melancholy—melancholy, however, in a being who sacrifices on the altar of the living God all resentment, every painful thought, and all recollection of injury, is a feeling which should indeed be permitted to her who has wept for twenty years over those whom she lost by a death more frightful in its manner than in itself.

The theft of the Queen of Westphalia's diamonds by Maubreuil was of a very extraordinary character, and one of which M. de Talleyrand can furnish the particulars. The Queen was returning leisurely to her residence in Germany, when she was surrounded, stopped, and then robbed, by persons under the direction of a man whom the Princess Catharine herself recollected.

This man showed her an order, signed by Louis XVIII., and then set to work with a quickness and regularity that showed, as the Princess said, that this was not the first time that he had been thus employed. M. de Maubreuil, before this adventure, was wholly unknown; but since, according to custom, we have spoken of nothing but him. This man, the bearer, as I have said, of an order signed by Louis XVIII., stopped the Queen of Westphalia on the 21st of April, at seven o'clock in the morning, between Sens and Weimans. He took from her a hundred thousand francs in gold, and her diamonds, estimated at about five million francs. He was accompanied by twenty persons, and had with him as an OSTENSIBLE accomplice a fellow of the name of Desies.

M. de Talleyrand was, as is well known, greatly compromised in this affair. What may have been the origin of it, it is not necessary to inquire; it was highly impolitic, and the event has since justified what I then asserted—M. de Talleyrand is not free from blame. Beyond this, until we have more positive evidence, we must be silent.

One of the most disgraceful characteristics of the journals of this time was the spontaneous servility which served me as a pretext for my absence. The Emperor of Russia and the Grand-Dukes Michael and Nicholas; the King of Prussia and the Princess; the Duc de Berri and an immense and elegant assemblage of nobility, were present.

The company of the Comédie Française were in attendance at this fête. Mademoiselle Mars played in "Le Legs" (the Legacy) most exquisitely, as she always does. This was succeeded by "La Suite d'un Bal Masqué," a pretty lively comedy, by Madame de Bawr, formerly the wife of M. de Saint Simon, who has given his name to a religious sect lately much in vogue: his wife composed plays perhaps better than her husband knew how to introduce a new religion. The temporary theater was erected in the gallery painted by Mignard. The effect was most complete, and the Emperor Alexander told me the next day that he had no idea of a play being performed in such perfection.

A slight accident cast a gloom over one portion of the company—a garland of flowers, cut in paper, which decorated the gallery, caught fire. The terrible misfortune which had happened to the same Prince Schwartzberg at the marriage of Maria Louisa immediately occurred to them, and a feeling of superstition, which was perhaps excusable, threw a shade over that portion of the assembly by whom the facts were known. The supper was served in a room adjoining the orangery, in which was a great profusion of flowers. The dancing was continued until daylight, and the whole fête was very well arranged. The Prince must have felt perfectly satisfied if no recollection of the past disturbed him.

The next day "Œdipe" was performed at the Grand Opera, at which were present his Majesty and the Duchesse d'Angoulême. The interior of the theater presented a most extraordinary appearance—none of the women had diamonds; all were in white, and all their ornaments consisted of plumes of feathers, of lilies, and of bunches or garlands of white lilac.

There was in the whole scene an elegance for which I could not at first account; I, however, afterward attributed it to the agreeable color that prevailed, and to the scent of the spring flowers which spread itself in every direction. The opera of "Œdipe" was ill chosen on this
